It is true that certain conditions have been called to our attention, but in each case we have turned the actual investigation over to those agencies of the Government that could legally conduct them. The charges against Frederick A. Fenning, one of the District Commissioners, were brought to the attention of the Judiciary Committee of the House; the traffic irregularities were placed before the Commissioners of the District; and the charges against Capt. Guy Burlingame, of the Metropolitan police department, were turned over to the United States district attorney and the corporation counsel. We have been careful not to trespass upon the province of the authorities whose duty it was to handle these matters.

We have pursued a plan of constructive suggestions in business methods and practices in handling the affairs of the District, after painstaking and careful investigation by experts. We especially direct attention to the summary of savings contained in the report, which covers the results of the entire survey. The specific departments referred to herein are those which have been covered since our former report to the first session of the Seventieth Congress.

The report is as follows:

REPORT OF THE SPECIAL SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The special subcommittee of the House of Representatives Committee on the District of Columbia submits the following report relative to its studies of activities of the municipal government of the District of Columbia. Only those studies that have been undertaken since the last report of the subcommittee will be included in this report unless further progress has been made in putting into effect the recommendations resulting from earlier studies.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The Board of Education has taken up for consideration recommendations relating to organization and administration of the public-school system resulting from the survey of the Bureau of Efficiency made at the request of the Appropriation Committees of Congress. Many of these recommendations have already been made effective; others will require legislation. In the latter class is the recommendation for warehousing of school supplies, on a railroad siding and in a suitable structure. It was considered the economical course to include warehousing of school supplies in a building under contemplation for the joint use of the Federal and District Governments in Washington. Authorization for such a warehouse building has just passed both Houses of Congress.

FISCAL RELATIONS BETWEEN THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED STATES AND THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The subcommittee has been interested in an equitable solution of the fiscal relations between the Federal Government and the District of Columbia. The Bureau of Efficiency in its report upon this subject (H. Doc. 506) has furnished accurate and reliable data which can and is being used in making an impartial and scientific analysis of this important subject.

TAXATION AND ASSESSMENTS

Personal-property taxation: As was stated in the last report of the subcommittee, there was a definite need for a change in the tax laws to provide more adequate means for compelling the filing of personal-property tax returns and enforcing the prompt payment of personal-property taxes. A large amount of unpaid personal taxes remained due the District government at the close of each fiscal year. Moreover, several thousand persons subject to tax failed to file personal-tax returns.

The necessary legislation to correct this situation was passed by Congress (S. 4441). This legislation gives the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia jurisdiction to compel the filing of sworn returns in cases where there is no satisfactory basis for assessment. The bill also establishes July 1 instead of the previous January 1 as the determining date for taxing personal property.

Taxation of motor vehicles: It was apparent to the subcommittee that the personal property tax on automobiles was not being paid by many car owners. The subcommittee has introduced legislation which has passed both Houses of Congress (S. 4441), which provides that motor vehicles taxable by the District of Columbia shall be assessed at their value as of January 1, and further that no motor-vehicle registration tag for any tax year shall be issued for motor vehicles subject to taxation on January 1 by the District of Columbia until the amount of such tax has been paid in full.

It is estimated that this legislation will produce approximately $75,000 additional revenue annually.

Methods of business, office of the assessor: A number of changes in the assessor's office looking toward simplification in procedure and expedition of assessments were made pursuant to the subcommittee's recommendations. Excellent results have been obtained from these changes.

Methods of business, office of the collector: As mentioned in the last report, it was brought to the attention of the subcommittee that the collector of taxes was depositing money or checks received as revenues of the District of Columbia with local banks before such proceeds were deposited with the Treasurer of the United States. This practice was illegal, and has been discontinued. The revenues are now deposited directly with the Treasurer of the United States.

PURCHASING AND PROPERTY CONTROL

Improvements in the purchasing procedure of the District government resulting from the recommendations of the subcommittee have brought even greater economies than were at first thought possible. This is particularly true of the transfer to the General Supply Committee of the function of contracting for common supplies used by the District government. The purchasing officer of the District recently stated before the House Appropriations Committee that savings resulting from this change in purchasing procedure will total at least $100,000 for the current fiscal year; to this should be added a $10,000 saving reported by the District Auditor from the taking of discounts under the General Supply Committee contracts, no provision for such discounts having been made when the District government contracted for common supplies independently.

The District government has put into full effect the new system of property control recommended by the subcommittee. Among the important results is the changing of the accounts of the property yards under the control of the District purchasing office to reflect the true condition of the revolving purchase fund and to keep the fund stable.

The subcommittee has had before it on several occasions complaints that purchase specifications of the District government for special equipment and for building materials are often so drawn as to needlessly and unfairly limit competition. Specifications for the purchase of fire apparatus, wood-turning lathes, face brick, and roofing slate have been considered by the subcommittee from this point of view.

Recommendation for changes in specifications have been submitted to officials of the District government after the committee had obtained the advice of the best-informed technical experts in the Federal Government. In several instances, on the other hand, the complaints of unsuccessful bidders relative to the restrictive character of District purchase specifications have proven to be without foundation.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA AUTOMOTIVE TRANSPORTATION

The board of commissioners has put into full effect the recommendation of the subcommittee that the repairing of motor vehicles of the police department be transferred to the District automobile repair shop. The results of this transfer include not only the release of several patrolmen and one sergeant of police for regular police duties, but also a great improvement in the condition of these motor vehicles. This latter factor is due to the expert repairing and oiling given the vehicles at the District automobile repair shop.

In order to further reduce the heavy expense of motorization of District government activities, amounting to over $600,000 annually, the subcommittee has made recommendations which it is believed should go far toward solving this troublesome problem for Washington's municipal government. First, a comprehensive survey of the entire subject was made, during the course of which certain objectionable practices were disclosed, called to the attention of the commissioners and at once terminated. Among these was the purchase of Mack trucks without competition under the guise of repairs.

Repairing and other servicing: The subcommittee's recommendations cover the consolidation of servicing of all motor vehicles of the District government in three well-equipped shops and adequate central control over the acquisition, use, housing, and servicing of these vehicles. As the result of these recommendations, orders have been issued by the commissioners looking toward further centralization of servicing of motor vehicles at the District auto-repair shop. Full compliance with the recommendations of the subcommittee with respect to servicing and housing of District motor vehicles will be possible upon the completion of two structures for which funds are included in the District of Columbia appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1929–30. These structures, which were recommended by the subcommittee, are (1) an addition to the District auto-repair shop which will treble the capacity of this central-servicing station, and (2) a garage to house the automotive equipment of the highway division, the trees and parking division, and other branches of the District government. Both of these structures are to be erected on Government-owned land at Second and Bryant Streets NW.—an ideal location. Thus the subcommittee feels that the problems of the District government arising from motoriza-tion are in process of solution. The machinery for central control, recommended by the subcommittee, remains to be set up.

Distinctive tags for District-owned motor vehicles: Among minor recommendations made to obviate misuse of District government vehicles is one that distinctive license tags be made for these vehicles to clearly designate them as city owned and operated. This recommendation has the approval of the director of traffic.

The board of commissioners has in the past adopted a practice in its hiring of motor trucks for city use which the subcommittee considers improper and uneconomical. It has established a list of truckers upon whom any department might draw for trucking services without securing competition. The rates to be paid were fixed by commissioners' order for each class of truck to be hired. The subcommittee has recommended that this practice be supplanted by the seeking of competitive bids. It is believed that lower truckage rates will be secured by the adoption of this recommendation, with which District officials have stated their agreement.

THE BOARD OF PUBLIC WELFARE

Water supply system and fire protection, District of Columbia workhouse and reformatory: The subcommittee has recommended, after a survey, an appropriation to provide a modern filtration plant and clear-water storage basins at the District of Columbia workhouse and reformatory. These will furnish an adequate supply of filtered and potable water for all purposes, including fire protection. The present water service has reached the limit of its capacity due to the rapid growth of the two institutions. The subcommittee is of the opinion that such a plant is essential to the health of inmates and employees of these institutions.

Power and heating facilities, District of Columbia workhouse and reformatory: The subcommittee has recommended an appropriation for the remodeling and rearrangement of the present power facilities of the District of Columbia workhouse and reformatory by consolidating two of the existing power plants. This consolidation will result in a decrease in the cost of generating electric current, and will increase the amount of current generated to meet the present needs of both institutions, while showing a considerable annual saving over present costs. The subcommittee is of the opinion that the early remodeling of the power facilities of the workhouse and reformatory is essential to the orderly development of the industrial program.

PRISON INDUSTRIES

Working capital fund: On the recommendation of the subcommittee provision was made for a working capital fund of $25,000 for the operation of industrial and farm activities at the District of Columbia workhouse and reformatory. This provision has made possible the employment of the necessary supervisory personnel and has placed the various industrial and farm activities on a businesslike basis. The wording of the law also provides for the payment of wages to inmates. This provision has not yet been placed in effect. The subcommittee is of the opinion that no more important duty devolves on those in authority than the immediate promulgation and payment of an equitable, graded schedule of wages to prisoners engaged in the industrial activities. The subcommittee believes that the payment of a small, graded wage to prisoners will undoubtedly improve morale by developing a proper interest and incentive in the individual prisoner, thereby encouraging good conduct.

As a result of a further recommendation of the subcommittee the working capital fund in the District of Columbia appropriation bill, 1930, has been increased from $25,000 to $50,000.

Manufacture of license tags in reformatory: The subcommittee has continued its interest in the operation of the automobile license-tag plant at the District of Columbia reformatory. The tags for 1929 were manufactured and delivered in ample time for issuance and the quality and workmanship were equal to the 1928 tags. This industry, aside from the saving effected to the District, has provided suitable employment for a number of inmates, and in so doing has contributed to the morale of the institution.

Inasmuch as the requirements of the District of Columbia make it unnecessary to operate the auto-tag plant at full capacity, the subcommittee is of the opinion that its excess facilities should be devoted to meeting the requirements of the several departments of the Federal Government in accordance with the provisions of the working capital fund.

Foundry at District of Columbia reformatory: The foundry established last year at the District of Columbia Reformatory following the recommendation of the subcommittee, in its development has far exceeded the expectations of the subcommittee. Not only has the establishment of this industry provided highly desirable vocational training for approximately 40 inmates, but the production for the first year is 100 per cent in excess of the anticipated production by reason of the large street-repair program. This demand will continue. Plans have been made for doubling the capacity of the plant as soon as funds are available. The subcommittee understands that as a result of its recommendation the immediate development of the foundry will include provision for the manufacture of brass, bronze, aluminum, and copper castings.

The manufacture of brick at the District of Columbia workhouse: As a result of the recommendation of the subcommittee, the District of Columbia appropriation act, 1929, provided appropriations of $28,000 for the repair of barges and repairs to the wharves at Occoquan and Washington, and $36,000 for reconditioning and enlarging the brick plant at the District of Columbia workhouse. The contemplated repairs and improvements are well on the way to completion and will increase production from 4,000,000 to 8,000,000 brick per year.

Already material production increases are apparent, and beginning with March, 1929, it is expected that production will approximate 700,000 brick per month. The total production estimated for the fiscal year 1929 is approximately 6,000,000 brick. This amount with about 4,000,000 brick on hand makes a total of approximately 10,000,000 brick available for the use of the District. The municipal architect has allocated over 5,000,000 Occoquan brick to building activities, while approximately 2,000,000 brick will be used in building construction at the workhouse and reformatory and in the sewer and other departments of the District of Columbia.

The subcommittee reports progress in its efforts to secure the full use by the District of all brick manufactured at the workhouse before purchases of common brick are made in the open market. The subcommittee has given consideration to the manufacture of face brick at the workhouse plant, but feels that this project should await the time when the production of common brick shall meet the full requirements of the District.

Development of laundry facilities at District of Columbia penal institutions and Gallinger Hospital: The subcommittee last year recommended that a laundry be established as one of the industrial activities at the District of Columbia Reformatory. This recommendation the subcommittee believes should be adopted without delay, not only to provide employment for the rapidly increasing number of inmates at the reformatory, but for sanitary reasons.

The subcommittee is of the opinion that prison labor should continue to be used in the new Gallinger Hospital laundry, thereby effecting a saving of approximately $12,000 per year, and at the same time providing necessary employment for jail prisoners.

Discharge gratuities for prisoners: The subcommittee recommended that increased gratuities in addition to clothing and transportation be furnished prisoners discharged from the District of Columbia reformatory as authorized by the act of July 3, 1926. The commissioners have adopted and placed this recommendation in effect, by ordering that the regulations of the Attorney General applicable to Federal penitentiaries shall govern the furnishing of clothing and the payment of gratuities to prisoners discharged from the District of Columbia reformatory.

Surplus property: The subcommittee has continued its efforts to obtain the transfer of needed surplus property from Federal establishments to the Government of the District of Columbia. The supplies so transferred, during the fiscal year 1928, were valued at approximately $125,000 and consisted of the following:

Automobiles, automobile parts and supplies	$6,015.61
Furniture, utensils, household equipment and furnishings	8,654.13
Livestock	860.00
Machinery, tools, hardware, metals, and supplies	56,328.93
Clothing and occupational therapy materials	636.38
Surgical instruments, drugs, hospital and laboratory equipment	52,208.19
Total	124,503.24

Through the efforts of the subcommittee the institutions under the board of public welfare are also obtaining, at considerable saving, much needed furniture from the United States Housing Corporation.

Accounting system proposed for District of Columbia workhouse and reformatory: A new organization plan and accounting system for the District of Columbia workhouse and reformatory have been adopted and are being installed. Under the new plan the accounting work for the two institutions has been consolidated and centralized in one office and a chief accountant has been employed to supervise the work. Expenditures from all appropriations are now made in accordance with approved budget allotments for the several departments or activities. The appropriation and allotment accounts are practically current under the new system, the records having been written back to the beginning of the current fiscal year (July 1, 1928). The cost accounts and inventory records are not yet current under the new system, but this work is being caught up as rapidly as possible.

The new system will make available currently to the general superintendent and to the heads of the several departments information concerning the operation of their activities which they have not had before and which is essential to efficient administration.

DEPARTMENT OF INSURANCE

The subcommittee in its last report set forth its action looking toward the revision of the insurance code of the District of Columbia. Legislation to accomplish this revision has been passed by the House of Representatives and is now pending in the Senate.

The subcommittee stated in its last report that the fire insurance companies were collecting excessive premiums in the District of Columbia in an amount approximating $600,000 annually. The Underwriters' Association of the District of Columbia has since announced a sweeping reduction in fire insurance rates effective January 1, 1929. This action of the Underwriters' Association proved the correctness of the subcommittee's contention with respect to the then existing excessive rates. It is believed that further reductions in rates can be accomplished.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA LICENSE SYSTEM

Business and miscellaneous licenses: The subcommittee's recommendations designed to speed up the issuance of licenses and thus eliminate a very considerable delay in the collection of fees have been adopted, and substantial progress is reported. As of January 1, 1928, the fees collected totaled $67,204 with outstanding fees of $94,537 still to be collected. On January 1, 1929, the records showed collections of $122,049 with outstanding uncollected fees amounting to $39,692. The increase in collections for the first two months of the current license year over the corresponding period of the last year thus amounts to $54,845—an increase of 88 per cent. It is confidently expected that a still better showing will be made during the license year commencing November 1, 1929.

Revision of license code: The subcommittee's report of May 29, 1928, stated that the suggestion had been made to the commissioners that a committee be appointed composed of the superintendent of licenses, a member of the corporation counsel's office, and a member of the Bureau of Efficiency, to prepare a revised license law for submission to Congress. This suggestion was followed and the subcommittee has received from the commissioners a draft of a bill prepared by the committee, together with a comprehensive explanation, paragraph by paragraph, of the action proposed in the bill. This bill was introduced in the House of Representatives on January 23, 1929 (H. R. 16526), and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. Due to the real need for such legislation, it is hoped that it will receive favorable consideration at the next regular session.

FREE PUBLIC LIBRARY

Upon the subcommittee's recommendation a bill (H. R. 16662) was passed by the House of Representatives, and is now pending in the Senate, providing for the expansion of the Public Library facilities of the District of Columbia and authorizing an appropriation of not to exceed $2,000,000 for this purpose.

The present library facilities reach only about 100,000 readers out of the more than half million population. Many sections of the city are without library service, and very little progress has been made in the provision of branch libraries, there being only three branches and four subbranches in the entire District. The passage of this bill above referred to will go far toward correcting this deplorable lack of library facilities.

OFFICE OF THE MUNICIPAL ARCHITECT

Painting and decorating of school buildings: Upon receipt of information that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia contemplated the painting and decorating of 28 school buildings under outside contract, an immediate investigation was conducted of the cost and feasibility of having this work done by the District repair shop. It was found that it would be both practicable and economical to call upon the repair shop to execute the entire program, and the commissioners were advised to this effect. Accordingly, no contracts were let.

As of February 25, 1929, the work on 25 of these buildings has been completed at a cost of $49,213.52. The lowest bids for these buildings totaled $95,739, indicating a saving of $46,525.48. The Board of Education has in the meantime decided not to paint one of the schools on the original painting program because it will soon be abandoned. The lowest bid for this job was $5,580. This work would have been done had the contracts been let as was originally planned, therefore the total saving to date amounts to $52,105.48. Since the two remaining schools will not be finished until the Easter holidays, the savings to be effected can not yet be reported.

OFFICE OF THE BUILDING INSPECTOR

At the request of the subcommittee a study is being made of the building inspection service of the District of Columbia. During the course of this investigation several interim reports have been prepared for the purpose of calling to the attention of the District authorities certain conditions which have arisen, due, apparently, to nonenforcement of the building code. The reasons for this nonenforcement are now being determined and will soon be presented in a comprehensive report which will contain recommendations designed to remedy the situation.

DIVISION OF TREES AND PARKING

A survey of the administration and methods of the trees and parkings service of the District government has been practically completed. The recommendations which are in process of preparation will undoubtedly point the way toward closer coordination between tree nursery production and the tree needs of the city streets, and toward more efficient and economical methods.

DISPOSAL OF REFUSE

The recommendation made by the subcommittee for the correction of the dump nuisance by incineration of all miscellaneous refuse, including street sweepings collected in the District of Columbia, whether publicly or privately, has been followed by request for legislation authorizing the building of two incinerators.

ACQUISITION OF REAL ESTATE FOR PUBLIC PURPOSES

In order to assure that transactions relating to the acquisition of property by the District shall be conducted with the greatest possible effectiveness, the subcommittee recommended the establishment of a board of real-estate purchase to be composed of the assistant engineer commissioner charged with conducting negotiations for acquiring real estate, and the district surveyor. The recommendation proposed that the two members should jointly conduct all transactions leading to the acquisition of property, and should consult with the tax assessor regarding property assessments, sales, and fairness of offers received.

PRINTING FOR THE DISTRICT GOVERNMENT

Adoption of the subcommittee's recommendation that printing for the District Government be done by the Government Printing Office has resulted in savings, according to the District purchasing officer, amounting on the average to 31 per cent of the total District appropriations for printing, or over $20,000 yearly. The quality of work done at the Government Printing Office for the District Government has been superior to that previously obtained from private contractors.

In accordance with the subcommittee's recommendation the District Government has consolidated its estimates for printing and the District appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1930 includes one item to cover all printing for all of the municipal departments.

Further investigation of printing for the District Government and of the production of multigraphed or mimeographed forms in its several departments has led to recommendations which are directed toward additional economies. It was found that three small printing establishments are maintained by (1) the District reformatory at Lorton, (2) the superintendent of the District Building, and (3) the police department. The subcommittee has recommended that these be consolidated by setting up a printing and duplicating branch of the purchasing office and by transferring the bulk of the printing equipment to the reformatory; it has further recommended that multigraph, mimeograph, and other duplicating equipment now scattered among the several city departments—and there only partially used—be transferred to the proposed printing and duplicating branch of the purchasing office where it may be used to advantage for all departments. By these means, and by the clearance of all requests for printing or duplicating through the practical printer in the purchasing office, also recommended by the subcommittee, it is believed that printing bills may be held to a minimum and that much printing for office use may be supplanted by cheaper duplicating processes. Further, printing as a prison industry at the reformatory will be encouraged by the acquisition of much needed equipment.

CONGESTION IN THE POLICE COURT, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The subcommittee endeavored to discover the reasons for and to relieve the congestion in the police court. It found this congestion to be due largely to the presence of police-officer complainants on minor traffic cases, and approved a plan whereunder complaining officers should not be required to appear in court unless their presence is absolutely necessary. It is understood the Board of Commissioners has accepted the principle of this plan and is taking steps to make it effective. This action should reduce materially the existing congestion and confusion in the police court, and keep policemen complainants on their beats.

CONCLUSION

The subcommittee had three objects in making its study: Namely, to recommend remedial legislation whenever necessary; to recommend needed increased appropriations; and to effect increased efficiency and money savings in current operations. It is therefore apparent that the results of the subcommittee's activities can not be measured in money terms; however, the actual monetary savings effected are as follows, no estimates being included where the savings can not be fairly estimated:

	Recommendation adopted	Recommendation pending
Transfer to the District government of property surplus to the needs of the Federal Government	$168,000
Decrease in cost of traffic signals due to the investigation of contracts for these signals	11,238
Total	179,238

The item of $168,000 was arrived at after due allowance of the amount which, based on past experience, would have been realized by the Federal Government had the surplus property been sold as was contemplated.

It will be noted from the above table that the annual savings which have been or may be realized by the adoption of the subcommittee's recommendations amount to about $1,226,140, and that there has been an additional specific (not annual) saving of about $179,238.

THE BURLINGAME CASE

On or about December 15, 1928, one Helen F. Bialock, a resident of Washington, and an owner of real estate, made a complaint to the chairman of the subcommittee, preferring charges of a serious nature against Capt. Guy Burlingame, of the Metropolitan police force. The charges were of such a nature that it was thought best to cause a check up to be made to determine if they were well founded. The Bureau of Efficiency was asked to do this; pending the check up the complainant went to Abilene, Tex., where she made the same complaint to Congressman THOMAS L. BLANTON, a member of the subcommittee. Acting upon the suggestion of the chairman, Mr. BLANTON secured from the complainant an affidavit covering these charges. This affidavit was in due course of time presented to the committee, Captain Burlingame was called before it, the affidavit was read to him; he was told that if a denial was made of any of the statements contained in the affidavits they would be withdrawn. He chose to remain silent, as was his right, and made no answer to these charges and made no attempt to explain them.

The subcommittee recommended to the Commissioners of the District that, pending investigation and action on the charges, Captain Burlingame be suspended. We felt that he should be treated the same as any other member of the police force against whom serious charges were preferred, and that to do otherwise would tend to disorganize and destroy the morale of the department. Captain Burlingame subsequently requested suspension, and it was ordered.

Charges were then filed against him involving conduct unbecoming an officer. A trial board was selected and he was duly placed on trial on the one charge.

Since then the complaining witness, who disappeared after her trip to Abilene, has been located and returned to this jurisdiction.

The office of the corporation counsel became active in the case, the Department of Justice joined, and the United States district attorney took up the matter. While the subcommittee has not fully let go of the case, it was decided that the regularly constituted officials should be left free to deal with the situation. Members of the committee are ready at any time to render assistance in order that the guilt or innocence of this high official of the Metropolitan police force may be speedily determined.

THE POLICE FORCE

An orderly investigation of the police force has been undertaken in response to many criticisms brought to our attention. This has been proceeding for some time. The inquiry has been hampered by publicity and in other ways. Situations have arisen at critical times which have served to defeat our efforts. We can not say that these were premeditated, but they certainly constitute a series of remarkable coincidences, to say the least.

In our opinion the rank and file of the membership of the police force are honest and faithful. They are dealing with a serious situation; modern crime is an organized business. Hundreds of millions of dollars are taken away from the American people annually. That crime is prevalent in the District is attested by the fact that during the last fiscal year nearly 100,000 arrests were made in the District of Columbia.

The undisputed testimony before the subcommittee is that 3,000 bootleggers are plying their trade daily in the capital city of the Nation. Gambling places have been run openly. The subcommittee caused a map to be made showing the exact location of scores of gambling joints, and presented the major and chief of police with a request that these places be closed. A more recent survey convinces us that the number of these places has not been materially decreased. Many have moved, but usually not out of the precinct where they were formerly doing business.

It is impossible to entirely stop gambling or the illicit trade in intoxicating liquors in a city of the size of Washington, but we are concerned that the police force, guarding the lives and property of the people of the Federal city, are honest and incorruptible. We are concerned that gambling be kept out of the departments and bureaus of the Government, where in the past it has materially affected the efficiency and morale of Government employees.

It is the opinion of the subcommittee that the entire police department should be reorganized on a scientific up-to-date basis. It must necessarily be reorganized to cope with the rising tide of crime. Any plan for such a reorganization requires study of the best system employed throughout the world. We have no right to criticize the system now in force here, with nothing to offer in its place. It is the purpose of the subcommittee, following its policy throughout this survey, to offer a bill carrying into effect our specific recommendations.

FORM OF GOVERNMENT

It is not our purpose to discuss in this report any proposed change of government for the District of Columbia. We feel it is our duty, however, to suggest a thorough study of forms of government in effect in the cities in this country and abroad to determine if the form now in effect is the most efficient that can be devised to suit our needs.

OTHER PROBLEMS

The members of the subcommittee have earnestly desired to completely conclude the survey during this session of the Congress, but we find ourselves confronted with other problems pressing for solution.

The apparent failure of justice in important cases recently tried before juries of the District have raised a storm of protest throughout the Nation to an extent, but even the honesty of individual jurors has been brought seriously into question. This whole situation, so closely related to the protection of the life, the liberty, and the property of the people of the Nation, is urgently necessary.

The lack of an adequate banking code requires careful attention.

It is necessary to break up the real-estate robberies under the guise of the law. Unscrupulous real-estate operators are taking a tremendous toll from people of ordinary means through dishonest methods.

FARM RELIEF

The SPEAKER. Under special order of the House, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORTON] for 15 minutes.

Mr. NORTON of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I appreciate the courtesy extended to me by the House in being permitted to discuss at this time a subject which is not now under consideration, and which has not been under consideration during the present session of Congress. I have reference to the farm problem. This subject was debated extensively during the last session of Congress and may be debated even more during the next session. It involves legislation that is of intense interest to me, and likewise to the people whom it has been my privilege and honor to represent in Congress during the past two years.

During the last session Congress passed and President Coolidge vetoed the McNary-Haugen farm bill. Members of Congress strived earnestly to formulate legislation that would result in a just equalization of the economic situation as it affects agriculture. In that effort the farm problem was studied in all of its phases, and farm leaders and others in a position to furnish valuable and desirable information with reference to the subject were consulted. The McNary-Haugen bill was the result of that effort. But the President and Congress disagreed, and the bill was vetoed. Thereafter no effort was made to secure the passage of some other legislation upon which the President and Congress might have agreed, and Congress adjourned without the enactment of the much-needed legislation.

Now, we are promised that such needed legislation, necessary to solve this important problem, is to be enacted during the coming session of Congress, that Congress will be called into a special session for that very purpose. I have every reason to believe that the President and Congress will approach the subject with a sincere desire to secure a constructive and effective solution of the problem when that time comes.

That fact, however, does not excuse us for our failure to act during the session that is about to adjourn or to relieve the President and Congress from just criticism for the failure to act during previous sessions in which this question has been an issue.

Fortunately the country now generally recognizes that there is a farm problem, and that legislative assistance by Congress must be given to its solution. The farmers have convinced the Nation of the justice of their plea for farm relief. How could anyone doubt or deny the justice of their plea when he is familiar with the present situation, with the depreciated farm values, the abandoned farm lands, the increasing farm-mortgage foreclosures, the many bank failures in rural communities, and the continuous drift of our farm people from the farms to the cities of the country. Furthermore, the issue was brought more forcibly to the attention of the Nation in the late presidential campaign, wherein both major political parties and their candidates promised adequate farm legislation. It is true that that was not the first time that political parties and candidates for public office have made such promises. The difference now and in the past, however, lies in the fact that they have been able to disregard their promises in the past, and that they now know full well that they will not be able to repeat in such a venture. The farmers of this Nation know what they want; they know what they are entitled to receive; they know what they must have to endure; they know what they have been promised; and they are going to insist upon a prompt and faithful fulfillment of that contract or know the reason for the failure thereof.

What then is the legislation that is to be passed in an effort to effect a proper solution of this question and to satisfy the demands of the farmers of the Nation? As I have previously stated on the floor of the House, two lines of procedure are open, and the acceptance of either can be used as a means of aiding in the solution of the farm problem by means of legislation. That end can be achieved through the enactment of legislation which will aid in bringing the other industries down upon a lower economic level by denying to them some of the advantages which they have heretofore enjoyed or by passing laws which will aid in raising the agricultural industry to that higher level where the other industries now operate, so that the farmers may enjoy equal prosperity with the others. I realize that there will be no disposition on the part of Congress to pursue the former course, but that the latter will be the one that will be followed. That being true, the farm proposals that will probably be considered during the next session of Congress will dissolve themselves into the following classes: Subsidy bills, money-lending bills, stabilization plans, tariff revision, and surplus control legislation.

The farmers of America are not asking for a subsidy. They do not want to be pauperized by Government doles, and they would indignantly scorn the suggestion that they should be made the wards of the Government. The farmers who have supported the McNary-Haugen bill in the past have done so because they have realized, all statements to the contrary notwithstanding, that that measure did not provide for a subsidy. All money-lending bills, therefore, which would make Uncle Sam foot the bill for all losses incurred in handling the surpluses are justly unpopular with the farmers. They know full well that such measures will not deal adequately with the farm commodity marketing problem. Also, the money-lending bills which throw all the burden of handling the farm commodities, and particularly the surpluses, upon the members of cooperative marketing associations are likewise not enthusiastically supported by the farmers because they have learned through bitter experience that it is virtually suicidal for a cooperative association to attempt to handle crop surpluses while a majority of the producers of that commodity remain outside of the organization, bearing none of the burdens, and reaping the benefits of enhanced prices. In other words, credit by itself, whether to subsidize agriculture or to aid cooperatives in the handling of their surplus products, will never solve the farm problem. That is not to say that proper credit is not necessary, for it is. Credit is not only essential, but the proper kind which will furnish money to farmers and to cooperatives upon more favorable terms will be of distinct benefit.

To some tariff revision embodies the best and the only means of a proper solution of the farm problem. The Ways and Means Committee of the House has been holding hearings almost continuously since the first of the year, and we have been told that the tariff changes and readjustments to be recommended by the committee, and later enacted into law, will be primarily for the purpose of aiding agriculture.

I sincerely hope that that may prove to be the final result, for the farmers are entitled to whatever protection and assistance they can secure from such tariff changes, to the end they may be in a better position to compete with foreign producers of farm products in the American market. Besides, if the protective-tariff policy is to be followed with reference to the other industries of the Nation in a position to benefit thereby, the same policy should be pursued in relation to agriculture.

Whatever the intent may be with reference to tariff revision, there are forces and influences at work that may cause the tariff changes to be affected to cause the farmers of this country more harm than good. If in increasing the duties on farm products the Congress also increases, out of proper proportion, the duties on the various commodities which the farmers must buy, they may discover later that the legislation which was intended to be in their behalf as a relief measure turned out to be an increased opportunity for profiteering on the part of others at their expense. Especially will that be true if no accompanying legislation is enacted to provide for the control of farm surpluses, for since the tariff by itself will not provide an effective means of influencing the price of any commodity of which the American farmers produce a surplus, additional legislation must be provided for that purpose.

We have been assured that stabilization corporations are to be provided for whose purpose it will be to aid in the control and sale of farm surpluses. That stabilization of farm prices is desirable every student of the issue will admit. The constant upward and downward change in farm-commodity prices, whether those changes be due to speculation or to other causes, is undesirable and detrimental to the best interests of agriculture.

Any legislation, therefore, that will tend to stabilize prices so that the farmers may have a better understanding of what they will probably receive for their products, whether sold immediately after being harvested or in a later market, will be of marked advantage and benefit to them. But legislation that will tend to stabilize the market will not necessarily result in an assurance of an adequate price for the commodity. In other words, a stabilized price will not necessarily be an adequate price. Farm prices may be stabilized on too low a level. In fact, it will be easier to stabilize such prices on a lower level than to stabilize them on a higher level. Therefore, stabilization, by itself, will not necessarily mean a profitable price to the agricultural producers of the Nation, and additional legislation will be necessary in order that the price may be stabilized on a proper basis.

I have already stated that the farmers will never tolerate any plan that involves a subsidy. I have also stated briefly the benefits to be realized from a proper credit system, from favorable tariff revision, and from effective stabilization. In addition other measures will probably be offered which will provide for the control and sale of crop surpluses in a manner similar to that embodied in the McNary-Haugen bill with the equalization-fee provision. We have been told in recent weeks, especially since the November election, that the McNary-Haugen bill with the equalization-fee principle of farm relief was rejected in that election, and that the farmers themselves expressed their opposition to it by voting the Republican ticket. Nothing could be farther from the truth. As everyone should know, the result of the campaign turned on other issues and not on the farm issue.

I venture to assert that if the farmers of this Nation could have expressed themselves on the farm issue alone, devoid of all other issues, they would have voted overwhelmingly in favor of that plan of farm relief. In other words, the last election was not a referendum on the farm issue.

Whatever the plan may be that shall finally be agreed upon as the best means of solving the farm problem, if it is an effective plan—one that will result in better prices for farm products to the end that the farmers may enjoy the prosperity to which they are justly entitled—it will be opposed as every other worth-while measure, including the McNary-Haugen bill, has been opposed in the past. If it contains a provision providing for the creation of a farm board, as it undoubtedly will, it will be assailed, and it will be claimed that the legislation will result in bureaucracy. I have no desire to defend the present tendency toward centralization and bureaucracy in this country. On the other hand, I shall welcome the day when that tendency shall cease, for our Federal Government is becoming top-heavy. However, I fail to see wherein it would be wrong to have a board or bureau whose function it would be to interest itself primarily in the welfare of agriculture, in view of the fact we have such boards and bureaus for the purpose of aiding practically every other important industry. Furthermore, it is interesting to note that some of those who oppose a farm board on the ground that it would result in bureaucracy are themselves most enthusiastic supporters of bureaucracy in other fields.

Everything seems to depend upon whose bureau it is, and as to whom is to be benefited by the operation thereof. Apparently those who so vigorously oppose the centralization and bureaucracy, which they say will result from any farm bill which would create a farm board, are not advocating that we abolish the Interstate Commerce Commission, created for the purpose of regulating railroad rates; the Federal Reserve Board, vested with authority to increase and lower interest rates; the Tariff Commission, empowered to suggest changes in tariff schedules; the Federal Trade Commission, whose function it is to investigate unfair and illegal business practices; and other similar boards, commissions, and bureaus.

If the law to be enacted will enable the farm cooperatives to gain a greater control over surplus crops, and thereby secure better prices, it will be branded as a price-fixing measure, and therefore economically unsound. There is a vast difference, however, between arbitrary price fixing and economic price influencing. There was not a provision or sentence or clause in the McNary-Haugen bill which authorized anybody or any agency to arbitrarily fix prices. Arbitrary price fixing involves the exercise of arbitrary compulsion to prevent the sale of a commodity at any other price than the one fixed by law or decree. Price influencing may secure a better price, but not a definite price. That such legislation will influence prices to the benefit of the farmers I do not deny. If it did not do that, it would be virtually worthless. If we are not going to do something to bring the farmer a better price for his products, then we are going to fail to do what ought to be done. What the farmer needs most of all is not more credit facilities but higher prices for what he has to sell, so that he can pay off some of the debts which he has already contracted, either personally or through his cooperative agencies.

The Government has already passed legislation or has created agencies which influence prices favorably for other groups in this country. We have the protective tariff whose avowed purposes and results have been to increase the domestic prices of domestic industries above the level which they would be otherwise if no duties were imposed upon imports. The protective tariff has that effect upon the prices of those farm products of which we do not produce a surplus. It is to make that tariff effective as to all farm products that surplus-control legislation has been proposed. The railroads of the country not only have price influencing but price fixing by Government decree in order to assure them of a profit. The banks have price influencing in the interest rates and rediscount rates by the Government through the Federal reserve system in order to maintain the prosperity of the banking interests in this country. Organized labor has price influencing through congressional legislation in the Adamson 8-hour law, and the various restrictive immigration acts which influence upward the wages of domestic labor by curtailing the supply of imported labor from foreign countries. No, price influencing is not a new principle in this country. If surplus-control legislation is to be rejected on this ground then the tariff act must be rejected; the restrictive immigration laws must be rejected; the Adamson 8-hour law must be rejected; the Federal reserve law must be rejected; and all the legislative proposals which influence upward the price or returns of other groups in this country must be done away with in order to be consistent.

The farmers in demanding such a plan of farm relief are not asking for price fixing, but they are asking for the enactment of a plan which will result in better prices for farm products, just as Congress has passed other laws which have brought higher prices and larger returns to other industries and groups in this country.

If the farm legislation to be enacted will promise or indicate a material increase in farm-commodity prices, it will be claimed that the enactment of such legislation will result in profiteering. Wild charges will be made by the enemies of such legislation, and they will make all sorts of absurd predictions that the consumers in the cities will be crushed under the intolerable increase in the cost of living if such a measure be enacted. Such charges are absurd and are not borne out by an analysis of the relationship existing between retail prices and farm prices. Because the price which the farmer receives is raised does not necessarily mean that the price to the consumer of the finished product will be materially increased. Most agricultural products are processed in some way or another after they leave the farm before they reach the consumer. In many instances the cost of the raw material produced on the farm is only a small percentage of the total cost of the finished product to the consumer. Labor costs, transportation costs, and processing costs frequently amount to far more than the cost of the raw material produced on the farm. For example, in the case of bread, a recent report of the Federal Trade Commission concerning the bakery industry showed that the price received by the farmer for the wheat contained in 1 pound of bread amounted to a little over 1 cent, whereas the consumer paid over 8½ cents for the pound of bread. Furthermore, a comparison of the farm price for wheat and the retail price of bread shows that the farm price of wheat may fluctuate upward and downward to considerable extent without changing appreciably the retail price of bread.

If the legislation to be enacted will be such as to indicate an increase in prices, and therefore, in profits to the farmers, it will be contended by its opponents that it will result in overproduction. That might be true if the legislation were to be formulated so as to apply to only one product, for in that event overproduction might result in that particular product, but if the measure or measures apply to practically all farm products it is difficult to see how greater overproduction would result. The farmers of the country are now producing as much as they possibly can in an effort to secure sufficient funds with which to meet operating expenses, pay interest on their indebtedness, pay increasing taxes, and have something left with which to support their families. If better prices could be secured, the farmers could more effectively do those things without increasing their production.

Because of the opposition which it has encountered, I shall be gratified if some plan, other than the equalization-fee provision, can be thought out that will accomplish the result for which that provision was intended. But if no such substitute can be secured, I would favor inclusion of that provision in the farm bill to be enacted, in order that an effective plan for surplus control may be provided.

I realize that it has been contended that the equalization-fee provision is unconstitutional, and much of the opposition to the McNary-Haugen bill has been based upon that ground. As to that, however, students of the issue differ. Many able constitutional lawyers who have studied this proposal have held it to be constitutional. The reports of both the Senate and House Committees on Agriculture contain an imposing array of court decisions upholding various principles involved in the equalization-fee plan. It is not an unwarranted delegation of legislative power, as has been alleged. The board is merely the agency of Congress in carrying out the policy outlined by Congress and is restricted and limited by the conditions set forth as to how and when the fee is to be applied and collected. This is based on a well-established legal principle. Congress has frequently delegated power to Federal agencies. Congress does not fix the freight rates of this country but has delegated that authority with certain limitations to the Interstate Commerce Commission. Congress has also delegated to the President authority to change the tariff rates upward or downward not to exceed 50 per cent. The United States Supreme Court, in a unanimous decision delivered by Chief Justice William Howard Taft, has ruled that the authority to change tariff duties, conferred on the President by the flexible provision of the tariff act, is constitutional, because the President in changing the duties is merely an executive agent in carrying out the will of Congress according to definite principles laid down by Congress. Similarly, the equalization-fee plan would authorize the Federal Farm Board to arrange for the collection of an equalization fee as the agent of Congress in carrying out its declared policy.

Nor is the equalization fee a tax on the farmers as its enemies have charged. It is not a tax but a fee collected for the purpose of conferring upon the producers and others large benefits in the form of increased prices resulting from orderly marketing of the surplus. This orderly marketing is made possible by the collection and use of the equalization fee. The removal of the depressing effect of the surplus upon domestic prices results in an increased price to the farmers throughout the season. As the Committee on Agriculture pointed out in its report on the McNary-Haugen bill the collection of the fee by a Government agency for other purposes than for taxes is not a new principle. An equalization fee plan was provided in the transportation act of 1920 giving the Interstate Commerce Commission power to fix rail rates so as to provide fair net profit return for all the railroads in the United States and in order to equalize the returns of the roads. Authority was given to collect an equalization charge from railroads receiving excessive returns and to lend from the fund so derived to railroads earning less than a fair return. The collection of this fee was sustained in the famous Dayton-Goose Creek Railroad case (263 U. S. 456). Many other instances in which Congress is imposing a fee which is not necessarily a tax are cited in a report of the Committee on Agriculture on said bill.

But whatever the plan may be which is to be enacted into law for the purpose of solving the farm problem, I assume that it will be one which will provide suitable credit to assist in the orderly marketing of farm products; one which will readjust the tariff rates so that the farmers may receive the protection to which they are justly entitled; one which will aid in the stabilization of prices, and in addition I hope it will provide proper control of surplus crops, so that the farmers may be assured of fair and adequate prices for their commodities. If necessary legislation is passed in behalf of the farmers, they will become more prosperous, their purchasing power will be increased, and others will benefit thereby. The farm problem is not a problem that solely concerns the farmers of this country, but a problem that concerns the Nation as a whole, and, therefore, its solution is essential to insure the future progress and prosperity of our country. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

JAMES J. DAVIS, SECRETARY OF LABOR

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the special order the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. VESTAL] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Speaker and ladies and gentlemen of the House, I desire to ask the indulgence of the membership of the House for a few minutes to pay my tribute of respect to one of our public servants. The business of the House keeps the Members so occupied in attending to legislative matters that we too often fail to note our appreciation of the work of many distinguished men and women until they have passed to the great beyond. I desire to call the attention of the House to the services of a member of the Cabinet. Just now our country enjoys a state of industrial peace and good will such as it has probably never known before. This condition does not just happen to obtain. In fact, things do not "just happen" in this country. They are made to happen by policies of our Government. The industrial peace we now enjoy has been brought about to a large extent by the masterful manner in which this Cabinet officer has handled the affairs of his office. I feel we owe a debt of gratitude to this man for the conspicuous services he has rendered the Nation.

His life is a romance in itself. In a few more days he will have rounded out a political career remarkable in its way. It is given to few men to have sat in the Cabinets of two Presidents of the United States and to have served both with such outstanding ability. His life and his character are most remarkable illustrations of what America means to the boy or the girl who really desires to make a name for himself or herself. The man to whom I refer is the Hon. James J. Davis, Secretary of Labor.

Forty-eight years ago he came here an immigrant boy. Forty years later he himself was in charge of our immigration. The whole story of his ability, his energy, and his character is told in that single, striking fact. This fact illustrates another thing. It is an object lesson to all immigrant boys that America is the land of opportunity and shows what any raw immigrant boy can do if he has the will to work.

Secretary Davis was born in the mining and iron town of Tredegar, South Wales. I have heard him remark that he was born in the thick of a strike. He entered the Cabinet in the midst of strikes; and for eight years he has been smoothing out differences between capital and labor all over the country, and has done his job so well that for the past few years we have had but little disturbance except the minor disputes and differences of opinion natural to men in their search for gain. Many more serious controversies the Secretary has been able to settle before they broke. He saw them in time and stopped them.

He gets this foresight by right of inheritance. His grandfather, skilled in the family occupation for generations—that of iron worker—was called to Russia as an expert to aid in establishing the first blast furnace in that country. Later he came to this country, to Maryland, to lend his experience in building the early furnaces here. In America he was quick to see the boundless possibilities of the future and strongly urged his son to try his fortunes here. The father of Secretary Davis acted on that suggestion and came to America to find a job and prepare a home for his family. When it was safe he sent for them. I have heard the Secretary tell that when the day of their exodus came, he had to be dragged from under a bed where he had hid himself because he did not want to leave his home.

Young Davis was 8 years old when he came to America with his mother and five other children, one of them a babe in arms. They came in the steerage and landed at old Castle Garden in New York. The city staggered them with its size and they soon became acquainted with one of its peculiarities. A thief got away with much of their baggage, including a feather bed highly prized by his mother. In Wales a feather bed is a mark of standing and affluence. To the immigrant mother it still had that value in America. The theft of it was a tragedy to her and while she tried to find it, two of her children were lost for several days and most of the family savings had to be spent before they were found. At last the brood was gathered together and boarded the train for Sharon, Pa., where the father was waiting to welcome them to the home he had prepared for them.

There the Davis boy lost no time in showing his mettle. He had in his soul "that something" and proceeded to make it work. They put him in school and in Sunday school, but they could not take all his time and energy. Before he reached 11 he had tried his hand at a dozen things. The hotel keeper in Sharon supplied his house with milk from his own cows. Davis hired himself out to drive those cows to pasture at $1.25 a month. He carried papers. He blacked boots. He went about town ringing the bell for auction sales. He delivered telegrams. He turned his hand to everything that would add some little to the family income. He was the all-around chore boy of Sharon; but all the while he was learning something. He was learning what a lot of chances there are to earn a living and to get ahead in this new America he had come to, and he was making the most of those chances.

For generations the Davises in Wales had been skilled workers in iron. Davis's father was one. It was in the blood and the blood soon spoke in the boy. It took any amount of persuasion, but the boy obtained permission to find employment in an iron mill. At first he sorted nails and wore his fingers bare. Next he got a job as helper to a puddler. At the age of 16 he became a journeyman puddler himself, and a full-fledged member of the union. I believe at that time there were only four or five boys of that age in the United States who were union members.

By the time of the 1890's Davis had become a crack craftsman at his job of iron puddling—but hard times were coming on. The iron industry was badly hit. Nothing daunted, Davis set out to find employment wherever the little that existed was to be found. Often the job he heard of was at some distance, and he had no money to travel. So he allowed the railroads to have him as a guest aboard the brake bars, or in the box cars or the caboose. At one time he was in Birmingham, Ala., and when the mills closed there, he went to Louisiana and cut sugar-cane and drove mules in building a levee. But all the while he was learning that there is work to be done in America, provided you go after it. And Davis was never the man to sit down and wait for a shutdown mill to reopen. He went where the mills were going.

Finally the slack times of 1890 to 1893 hit the iron industry especially hard, but the pioneering minds thought it as well for this country to make its own tin plate instead of buying it from foreign labor. Tin-plate mills were being built and the McKinley tariff gave them protection and a start. Davis saw a better chance for steady work in this new industry and obtained a job in Elwood, Ind., in my own district. And there it was that I became acquainted with James J. Davis, when we were both young fellows around 20 years of age. I remember him yet as a black haired, blackeyed, muscular young man seeking a job. Elwood was one of the crossroad towns of Indiana that sprang up out of the fields over night as a result of new industries, and the fact that Elwood industries were able to run when hard times had closed nearly all the others. The Indiana industries had one great advantage—cheap fuel—natural gas. This fact had much to do with determining the location of the first tin-plate factory in America.

The new tin-plate works were close to the farms owned by my father and brothers, and we were all interested in seeing these new wealth-producing industries open up. It was a day long to be remembered when the sainted William McKinley, himself, came there to dedicate this new mill—the industry he believed would profit, along with every other, under his protective-tariff principle. Great crowds came from all over the State to witness that significant ceremony. Outwardly, it was the opening of a tin-plate mill; in reality, it was the opening of a great era of prosperity. McKinley took the country at the lowest ebb in its economic history. He left it five years afterwards at the highest peak of prosperity it had ever experienced up to that time. I dwell on that striking ceremony because Davis and I have always felt as if we had a personal hand in starting the country off on a fresh brust of speed!

If my colleagues will permit me to reminisce for a moment, I might say that Davis and I were both employed in this great tin-plate factory—he as a roller and I as a pickler—and we became great friends. His ambition always was to do his job a little better than any one else doing the same sort of work. If the mill was down during any of the summer months, he did not loaf around waiting for it to open, but went on the farms of the adjoining countryside and labored there until they started up again. We all knew that such a fellow would get on in the world. He was a leader even then, as if born to it.

He was soon in the higher councils of the tin workers' union. It seemed to me marvelous the way he handled ticklish questions in the new industry, adjusting wages, working conditions, and disputes. It was said among his fellow workers that he could run off backward the wage rate of every one in the tin-plate industry. Others had to go over the wage-scale books; Davis had them at his finger tips. The man already was thorough. He knew the men as he knew the business—worked with them, lived with them. And he had their unbounded respect. In the great strike of 1896 he was instrumental in obtaining a successful adjustment.

One other thing appeared to be in this man's blood—a gift and a love for politics. They early made him one of the leaders of a large delegation from Elwood to Canton, Ohio, to pay respect to William McKinley. Davis and I both cast our first vote for the martyred President, by the way. The next I knew, young Davis, hardly more than of legal age, was running for city clerk of Elwood. He always had been popular in the community, and it goes without saying that he was elected, with only a few votes against him, if I remember rightly. In fact, his success was so sweeping that it wholly obscured the opposition he had to encounter. The opposition grew out of a story worked up by his political rivals to the effect that as only a mill worker he could not possibly have the necessary education to be city clerk. It was even said that he could not read or write, not to say cipher. To answer this sort of opposition Davis took a blackboard with him wherever he made a speech, and asked any school-teacher in his audience to give him a sum to do or a sentence to write. He rang the doorbell or knocked at the door of every home in Elwood, and while the other candidates for the office sat back and issued confidence statements as to their certain success, Davis got out and did what he has always done, he worked. Perhaps that accounts for the fact that only four votes were rung up against him.

After four years as city clerk he was next elected county recorder of Madison County, one of the responsible positions in county and State administration in Indiana. But even then he never allowed success, political or otherwise, to turn his head. He knew how to be a friend and he had his friends in plenty. He never forgot one. In the hard times of the early nineties he shared his money, his food, and even his clothes with those who were harder hit than he.

One instance of his helpful friendliness comes home to me. At the time I was candidate for the office of prosecuting attorney in Madison County but because of illness was unable to attend the convention. However, my cause was not neglected. Davis was there to champion the interests of his friend. He led the fight in the township and county and did yeoman work in helping me to win the election.

After four years as county recorder he retired from political activity in Indiana, refusing a renomination at the hands of his party. The reason was that he had another and better job. It was characteristic of him to see his real opportunity wherever it showed itself, and Davis had recognized it in the work of building up a fraternal organization, the Loyal Order of Moose. Here again I watched his work at close hand, because in those days I served as general attorney and counsellor in this order. Fortune had cast before Davis one of the great and absorbing interests of his life, and he knew it. When he took over the fraternity it was a dying organization reduced to 246 members. He became the two hundred and forty-seventh, and lodge No. 1 was organized in my own city. It was a bleak prospect to revive a body so close to extinction, but Davis set to work with his characteristic vigor and energy. By then he had gained a wide knowledge of the country from his rovings, and with it a wide acquaintance and popularity. These things both served him. A born organizer and leader, success was certain. It called forth his every instinct, the instinct to help, for he is intensely human.

The whole story of Davis's work with that fraternity is told in the fact that it now has a membership of well over 700,000, with financial resources above $30,000,000. Out of the enthusiasm and energy of this one man the institution has been rebuilt and made what it is. He fired others with his own faith and optimism. At this time the organization he has built is among the most active and prosperous of them all. The Home for Aged Members, in Orange Park, Fla., and the great home and school, city of Mooseheart, founded by Davis, where the Moose fraternity is training and educating more than 2,000 orphaned children, are but two of the beneficent activities of this organization; and already Mooseheart ranks as one of the great and model educational and philanthropic institutions of the country.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. VESTAL. It was this swift and outstanding success as an organizer that attracted to Davis the attention of President-elect Harding as possible timber for the position of Labor Secretary. Few others had anywhere near his qualifications. He was still a member of the union he once served. He had an unrivaled acquaintanceship among men of all ranks, employers as well as employed. He had experience in handling large affairs. He was the custodian of great funds intrusted to his care, and on his own account he already was a business man and an employer. The combination seemed ideal, and the new President was quick to see it. And another opportunity for service offered itself to Davis. He was prepared to meet it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VESTAL. I will be glad to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I would like, in the gentleman's time, if the gentleman will permit, to pay a brief tribute to Secretary Davis for his handling of the new quota laws, undertaking a new thing—the closing of the immigration gates—and for his carrying out of the purposes of the 1921 and 1924 acts in a most efficient manner under the greatest difficulties. We of the Immigration Committee have had great benefit from the suggestions of Mr. Secretary Davis. I thank the gentleman from Indiana for what he is now saying.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has again expired.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for three additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. VESTAL. How well the choice has been justified, succeeding events have proven. Two Presidents have kept him in their cabinets against his repeated wishes to retire. Organized labor, at first fearful that Davis had cooled in his attitude toward labor, are now among his stoutest supporters and capital praises his fairness. Our national industry, largely because of his unceasing efforts to spread good will and the spirit of partnership between employer and worker, now enjoys its present unprecedented peace and contentment.

We little realize what an undertaking it was to bring about this peace and contentment in the industrial world. In 1921 when the Republican Party came back to power it found the country paralyzed in the worst business recession since 1893, and with nearly 6,000,000 out of employment. But Davis is a genius at salesmanship. We went up and down the land preaching the simple fundamentals that lead to prosperity. His slogan everywhere was "The way back to prosperity is to work your way back." He literally sold the country this idea of work. His plea to employer and worker wherever he went was to pull together, to forget old rancors, to pool their common interests in a single partnership for business success. Selling the idea of work and burying the hatchet of industrial discord, however, were only two of the elements which contributed to the success of the administration of Secretary Davis. A believer in tariff on merchandise to protect American industry, he also believed in the principle of protection for labor from the unfair competition of low-paid alien labor. The first immigration law seeking to restrict the number of aliens permitted to come to America was very difficult in actual operation. We recall the tales of hardships arising from the separation of families, racing steamers, and so forth, and thousands being turned back at ports of arrival after they had disposed of their homes and journeyed across 3,000 miles of ocean. We no longer hear these stories, because things have been smoothed out, thanks to the energy and foresight of Davis. When we passed the selective immigration law, it was said that foreign governments would not let the United States examine and select immigrants before they left home, but through Davis's persistence this is now done in all of the larger immigrant-sending countries. In other words, in the administration of the immigration law he took what appeared to be an impossible situation and made it one which now has nothing but commendation not only by our citizens but by the aliens. He has raised the dignity of citizenship by a strong administration of the naturalization laws and the furtherance of Americanization education.

Business and home affairs of the Nation have equally benefited from the executive ability of this Secretary of Labor. At the head of the Housing Corporation he was the manager of the Government Hotels in the Nation's Capital, where 1,800 women workers of Uncle Sam were housed and fed; he operated the ferries of Norfolk, and in doing so improved the service and changed the color of the figures on the balance sheet from red to black. He has profitably disposed of much war property and rented other of it.

By his efficient administration of the Children's Bureau, official reports show that infant mortality is lower and maternal deaths fewer. Especially is this true as to rural aid, in the sending out of a completely equipped clinic, known as the baby special to places where otherwise aid and instruction in maternal hygiene would be impracticable. In addition, health centers, in many communities have been established with the cooperation of the Children's Bureau. Industry has been made safer, more comfortable, and more satisfactory for women; their interests safeguarded in factories and other places where women, in our present scheme of living, find employment.

Another great bureau under the administration of the Secretary of Labor, of which record he may well be proud, is the Bureau of Labor Statistics. The accuracy and currency of the figures and facts compiled by this agency under Mr. Davis have been accepted wherever these factors are essential. He has for the past eight years been chairman of the Federal Board for Vocational Education. Always interested in education, and particularly in that phase of it which fits men for lives of useful service, he has carried the spirit of his interest into the work of this board and extended its usefulness into new and many fields.

It is hard to say which of the two achievements that stand to the credit of Mr. Davis is the greater. He built up, first, a great benevolent fraternity to bring sweetness and help into the Nation's social life. Through the administration of his Cabinet office he has helped materially to build up a new national spirit in the industrial and economic world, instrumental in bettering the Nation's material life. Either achievement would distinguish any man.

Now, he is about to turn his back on further political activity, although it is rumored that he will be retained by the incoming President. If Mr. Hoover exercises the good judgment we know he has, he will persuade Mr. Davis to continue in the office he has managed so well for the past eight years. In the words of Uncle Joe Cannon, "He could go a great deal further and do a mighty sight worse." But if he does leave the Cabinet, I hope it is to mean a return to his benevolent work. Throughout the double term of office he has never relinquished his interest in Mooseheart, the project that grew from bitter experiences in his youth. In the days when he was the iron puddler, it was often the sad experience of Secretary Davis to witness the fate of some neighboring family when accident at the mills had crippled or killed its chief bread-winner. He saw wives made widows, with broods of tiny children about their knees and with no means of support. He saw these children tossed out into the world to work at an age when they needed to be learning their A B C's. What chance had they in life, he was left to wonder? He saw brothers separated and thrown into ways of life so far apart that they never saw each other again. It was then that Davis resolved some day, when he was able, to establish a refuge for such unfortunates. The result is this city of homes and schools at Mooseheart, where orphans of the members of this organization, similarly robbed of parents and prospects, are given an opportunity with the best of us to win their places in the world.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there for a minute?

Mr. VESTAL. Certainly.

Mr. PURNELL. I wish to say that I heartily indorse all the sentiments the gentleman has expressed. If I may, I should like for myself and my district to get a little of reflected glory by saying that for a short time Mr. Davis lived in the ninth congressional district of Indiana. [Applause.]

Mr. VESTAL. In addition to his achievements as Secretary of Labor, and as organizer of a great fraternal endeavor, James J. Davis also takes rank as an educational force. He has made a great Secretary—always kind and courteous to Members of the House and Senate—always willing and anxious to help them with any problem touching his department. He may be justly proud of the esteem in which he is held by the Nation; but there is yet another glory that is his. To-night, in Mooseheart, 2,400 orphaned children will kneel beside their trundle beds and say their prayers for the man who has made it possible for them to have a home and to receive an education that will fit them for the battles of life on even terms with the more fortunate children of America. Where else can we point to a life more widely rounded out in good and helpful work for humanity? Now, at this milestone in such a career it seems to me we ought to pause in our busy lives to pay due tribute not only to the achievements of the Secretary of Labor but to our good friend, familiarly known as Jim Davis! [Applause.]

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VESTAL. I yield.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. As a friend and admirer of Secretary Davis I want to thank the gentleman from Indiana for the fine address he has given us. It is to me a classic in the form of a personal tribute. The life of James J. Davis is indeed an American romance. It presents the opportunities and possibilities that underlie American life. I wish that every boy and young man could read the story of that life as Mr. Davis himself has written it, The Iron Puddler, a book that reminded me of the immortal autobiography of Benjamin Franklin. [Applause.]

SPECULATION AND ITS EFFECT UPON INDUSTRY

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a short editorial from the Manufacturers Record on the subject of the Federal Reserve Board.

The SEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an editorial from the Manufacturers' Record on the subject of the Federal Reserve Board. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include an editorial from the Manufacturers Record dealing with the warning of the Federal Reserve Board on February 6, 1929, entitled "Speculation and Its Effect Upon Industry—A Remedy Suggested," of date February 14, 1929, which is as follows:

SPECULATION AND ITS EFFECT UPON INDUSTRY—A REMEDY SUGGESTED

The Federal Reserve Board, on February 6, issued a solemn warning to the country. It declared that "the extraordinary absorption of funds in speculative security loans which has characterized the credit movement during the past year or more, in the judgment of the Federal Reserve Board, deserves particular attention lest it become a decisive factor working toward a still further firming of money rates, to the prejudice of the country's commercial interests." It then stated that the resources of the system are ample for meeting the growth of the country's commercial credit needs, provided they are competently administered, and it added: "The Federal reserve act does not, in the opinion of the Federal Reserve Board, contemplate the use of the resources of the Federal reserve banks for the creation or extention of speculative credit. A member bank is not within its reasonable claims for rediscount facilities at its Federal reserve bank when it borrows either for the purpose of making speculative loans or for the purpose of maintaining speculative loans. The board has no disposition to assume authority to interfere with the loan practices of member banks so long as they do not involve the Federal reserve banks."

This solemn warning, which immediately depressed the security markets, was addressed not to speculators but to the great member banks. No corporation can procure reserve credit. Reserve credit can be got only by member banks. They have used the facilities which have been granted them by law. There are cases where a single member bank has used more than a hundred millions of reserve credit at one time, while a heavy lender in the call market. It is these banks that the Federal Reserve Board hold responsible for the extravagant credit conditions in New York, and it is these banks, apparently that the board intends to discipline.

The Federal reserve act declares that the reserve banks may—not must—rediscount. For many months past the trans-Mississippi reserve banks, using the authority apparently conferred on them by the use of this word "may," have simply declined, in many cases, to rediscount for banks that were lending money on call in New York. By this method these trans-Mississippi reserve banks were enabled to keep their basic rate down to 4½ per cent as against the 5 per cent rate in New York. What the board evidently intends to do, whether it says so publicly or not, is to extend to the East the practice which has been so prevalent and so successful in the trans-Mississippi territory.

It will be noted that the board specifically stated that it objected to the "further firming of money rates" on the ground that it would imperil the country's commercial interests.

The board obviously is against high rates. It has been clear for some time that the board has only sanctioned high rates because of the orgy of speculation. There has been nothing in the statistical position to justify high rates. There has been no such demand for credit from industry as to justify high rates. There has been one justification for them, and one justification only, namely, the hope that they would serve to keep speculation within moderate limits.

There would be little possibility of a member bank abusing its rediscount privilege were rediscounting confined to eligible commercial paper, as the reserve act originally contemplated. In order to finance the war, the act was amended so as to permit member banks to borrow on their own 15-day notes, using Government securities as collateral. It was formerly pointed out in these columns that this, in effect, makes the public debt the basis for credit expansion and permits the abuses against which the reserve board now complains. If the right of the reserve banks to refuse to rediscount is acquiesced in, this 15-day privilege would lose much of its importance, otherwise the great member banks actually control the money situation and the Federal Reserve Board can do little more than make gestures.

We think the board is entitled to every commendation for the effort it has made to protect legitimate business; but even that commendation must be predicated on the assumption that the board is right in assuming that control of speculation is within its functions. There were three classic methods whereby the board could control the market; to sell securities in the open market, to raise the discount rate and to permit the exportation of gold. It tried all three and all three failed. They failed because as fast as the reserve banks took credit out of the market the great corporations, having surpluses, put it back again. Where once banks furnished virtually all the call money, the corporations and outsiders now furnish almost half of all brokers' loans. On February 6, of a total of $5,669,000,000 of brokers' loans $2,621,000,000 were "for others," meaning that that amount of money was being provided from sources outside the banks, chiefly corporations, investment trusts, etc., etc.

In 1920, in a somewhat similar "extravagant situation," Governor Harding and the Federal Reserve Board demanded and got legislation authorizing the reserve banks to charge graduated rates, on the plea that this authority would be used to penalize heavy borrowers in the financial districts and to relieve the stress in the agricultural districts. But the power was actually used in just the contrary way. The graduated rates were never made effective except in those reserve banks serving agricultural districts. But, in 1923, this authority was repealed, else now the reserve banks might handle the situation by using a graduated rate.

What, then, is the actual situation? Hundreds of millions of corporate funds are withheld from productive purposes and are loaned in New York. The high rates have failed to achieve their purpose. Instead of preventing a speculative orgy, they have actually encouraged it because it is the high rate paid for call money that has made it profitable for corporations to lend their surplus funds on call. To raise the rates again will simply be to accentuate an already bad situation and to attract more and more money to New York. There is no hope in high rates. They force Europe, just beginning to get back to normalcy, to raise rates over there and thus penalize industry at the very moment when it needs and must have stimulation. High rates tend inevitably to enhance the value of gold everywhere, and that is only another way of saying that they tend to force the commodity price level down, bringing about depression instead of prosperity and leading ultimately to a revision of the wage scale and a general loss of all the progress made in advancing the standard of living. The Federal Reserve Board virtually admits this. To all intents and purposes, it confesses that in order to control stock speculation, it has for more than one year been actively penalizing business, such penalization having now reached the point, where, if persisted in or aggravated, it might well bring about, and would almost certainly bring about, a trade depression in this country and in the whole world.

That this Nation, in a time of profound peace, when its wealth is so great that it is almost inconceivable, with a supply of gold unprecedented in relative or absolute value, should be given credit only at an artificial and devastating rate is not a blunder; it is a crime. It is not only a crime against the people of this country but it is a crime against people everywhere, and particularly is it a crime against the hewers of wood and the drawers of water.

It has been demonstrated that the high rate is an abortive cure. But there must be some cure. There is, and it is a very obvious one. Instinctively, we are opposed to any arbitrary grants of authority. But, if there is in fact an excessive use of credit in speculation, and if in fact the volume of this credit must be controlled, then by all means let it be controlled not by the rate but by some more or less arbitrary determination as to the volume of reserve credit that will be extended on Government securities. There could not be any undue use of reserve credit that was based on eligible paper only, because such eligible paper measures thoroughly the legitimate needs of commerce. But that reserve credit which is based on Government securities is a credit arbitrarily granted and therefore the use of it could of right be arbitrarily controlled. It is the key to the whole situation. If it is not controlled there is going to be a very formidable movement in Congress for the repeal of the war-time amendment that permits the practice and that, we think, by reason of the fact that so much of this sort of credit has become inextricably frozen into the credit system, might well be disastrous.

A master solution is required and, as usual, because it is a master solution it is a simple solution. The basic rate should be reduced to 4 per cent and probably stabilized at that figure. The reserve banks everywhere should then pursue the policy which has been followed for many months past in the trans-Mississippi territory and, while never declining to advance credit on eligible commercial paper, should be most careful in all credit granted on the member banks' 15-day notes, collateraled by Government securities. In this way an excessive use of reserve credit in the speculative markets could be absolutely prevented. But another objective of almost equal importance would be obtained. The hundreds of millions of corporate funds now lent on call are lent on call because it is remunerative for them so to be employed. Were the incentive of profit removed by a lower basic rate in New York the greater part of this money would have to look elsewhere for profitable employment.

Much of it ought automatically to go into business enterprise. So great a sum of money put to productive uses would stimulate employment and commerce all over the country, and would be an absolute assurance of prosperous months ahead. But the proposal is not ours. It has been made, in private, by some of the foremost financial authorities in this country. They admit it would be a Napoleonic coup, but Napoleon got results.

The country fears the financial situation. It is afraid that a few men, shut up in that cold, damp Treasury Building, are frightened by statistics. The enormous increase in our wealth may make them nervous. Perhaps the financial system was not formulated to be capable of handling any such volume of business as is now normal in this country. Men talk of the tremendous amount of credit in the market. There is less money lent per unit of investment on securities in this country to-day than in any period of its history. The average margin account is probably about 50 per cent. That means that people who buy stock pay immediately one-half their cost. In the old days, on a sound stock priced at $100 it was considered quite safe to pay $20 cash and to borrow $80. Unit for unit, there is less money lent to-day on securities than ever before. Now, if our wealth is expressed in such vast figures that even comparatively low loans on the volume of securities constitutes so great an absolute sum that it imperils the smooth functioning of the financial system, then it is the financial system, not our business system, that needs revision. This world, and this country particularly, will never consent to have its progress held back and absolutely measured by the volume of gold that may happen to be in existence or be mined. Gold is not our wealth; it is a mere symbol of wealth. Certainly it is not our commerce that is obsolete and it may well be that it is the financial system, not our method of doing business, that lacks modernity.

To control stock speculation by breaking down values all over the country would be to provide a cure worse than the disease. The continuance of high rates will be ruinous, as the reserve board itself intimates. Therefore, there can be only one sound policy. A method must be found to reduce the rate for legitimate business and business men everywhere should insist that such a method be found.

MISSISSIPPI'S CONTRIBUTION TO OUR COUNTRY

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by publishing a speech made at the Mississippi Society night before last. I know it is a good speech, because I made it myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to extend his own remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Speaker, acting upon the unanimous consent of the House to extend my remarks, I am giving something of a repetition of my address to the Mississippi Society on Mississippi's Contribution to the Military and Civil Services of our Country.

In every worthy civilization love of country has been a fundamental virtue. Without the patriotic loyalty of its citizens no country can have or ought to have either length of endurance or glory of achievement. As a pious devotion patriotism has always gone hand in hand with religion.

Breathes there a man with soul so dead
That to himself he hath not said·
This is my own, my native land,
Whose heart hath not within him burned
As home his footsteps he hath turned
From wandering on some foreign strand?
If such there be, go mark him well,
For him no minstrel raptures swell.
Proud though his title, high his name,
Boundless his wealth as wish can claim,
Despite his titles, powers, and pelf,
The wretch concentered all in self
Living shall forfeit fair renown,
And doubly dying shall go down
To the vile dust from which he sprung
Unwept, unhonored, and unsung.

Yet I am not sure but that the elemental factor in it all is local patriotism. One loves his home—his home town, his home county, his home State, and finally his country, of which these are a part.

These local attachments bind people together in smaller groups which, by union, make up the larger unit called our country.

This assembly comes together to-night bound by that close tie which unites us as Mississippians dwelling for the time in our National Capital, but rejoicing in a common love for our own State, and a common pride in her great men and women, her great spirit and her great achievements present and past. For at last the true greatness and the just pride of any State lies in the people it has produced, and in the spirit they have shown, and in the service they have rendered.

From her territorial days Mississippi began to produce citizens, soldiers, and statesmen who commanded nation-wide admiration.

Glance first at her record of service in Army and Navy. While our State was yet a Territory our country suffered the misfortune, not to say the disaster, of the second war with England. The enemy had not only invaded our borders but had reached our Capitol and set it on fire. To say the least, the conflict was bringing little glory to our arms. Discouragement and humiliation prevailed to such an extent that people in New England alarmed for their commerce and fisheries, were meeting in the Hartford Convention and discussing the matter of disrupting the Union by secession. One of the ablest and most learned of New England Congressmen has expressed to me the opinion that the people of his section would have seceded at that time had not "Old Hickory" Jackson won the battle of New Orleans, sending a thrill of courage and enthusiasm to their doubting hearts. So it seems an interesting fact that a great southern general won a signal victory and saved the Union.

But we of Mississippi rejoice especially in the fact that next to the name of Andrew Jackson comes the name of Thomas Hinds, who, with his fellow Mississippians, met the shock of the famous Scotch troops and did more than any other regiment to turn the tide of battle and give victory to the American forces.

Again in the war with Mexico Jefferson Davis, with his Mississippians in their famous V formation, turned defeat into victory at Buena Vista, and later it was a Mississippian who planted the American flag on the ramparts of the Montezumas in the City of Mexico.

In the tragic War between the States Mississippi sent to the front her full quota of brave men and gallant officers. It would take more time than can be given in this brief address to even mention the Confederate generals whose names are a credit to our State. They are known, loved, and honored by all our intelligent citizens, and any tribute that I might pay them here would contribute nothing to the facts of history and add nothing to their renown. It may be worth while, however, to remind you that Nathan Bedford Forest, whose dash and strategy has commanded the admiration of military critics the world over, may be justly claimed as a Mississippian. He had moved from Hernando to Memphis, Tenn., just before the Civil War began.

In the recent World War we can again claim our full share of the service and the glory.

Gen. P. D. Lochridge, of Itawamba County, was Chief of Staff of the American section of the Supreme War Council in France.

Gen. Fox Conner, a native-born Mississippian, held the important position as Chief of Operations on the staff of General Pershing. General Pershing's senior aide was the late Maj. John G. Quekemeyer, of Yazoo City, Miss., Maj. Gen. Henry P. McCain, of Carrolton, Miss., was The Adjutant General of the Army at our entrance into the World War, but was later assigned to the duty of training a division of combat troops for duty in France. Maj. Gens. Walter H. Gordon, now deceased, and Beaumont B. Buck were native-born Mississippians, and commanded divisions of combat troops in France with distinction. The Governor of the Canal Zone during the war was Gen. Chester Harding, a native-born Mississippian, and Gen. Robert K. Evans, another Mississippian, was taken from the Army retired list and assigned to the command of the Philippine Department during the war. One of the early casualties among field officers was that of Lieut. Col. R. J. Maxey, a native-born Mississippian. When mortally wounded, Colonel Maxey asked that he be taken first to his brigade commander to enable him to give first-hand information regarding the progress of the fight. Sergt. William Norton, of Mississippi, leading a detachment of Company I, Eighteenth Infantry, brilliantly repulsed a German raid, and as a result of this exploit was one of the first enlisted men to be decorated for bravery on the field of battle. Sam Coye, of Columbus, Miss., was one of our foremost aces during the air fighting incident to the World War. He was decorated for the success and brilliancy of his air fighting. Col. Troy Middleton, of Meridian, and Col. E. G. Peyton, Columbus, were decorated for the successful manner in which they trained and commanded their regiments in action.

But before leaving the subject of Mississippi's great men in the Army, let us remember Colonel Burgess, of Starkville, now Governor of the Canal Zone. I met him in Balboa a short while before he became governor, and was told there that he was perhaps the ablest and most influential man in the zone, and that he was really the man who ought to succeed to the gubernatorial chair.

In the Navy, three Mississippians hold the rank of admiral. They are Admiral Magruder, of Vicksburg; Admiral Leigh, of Panola County; and Admiral Dismukes, of Noxubee County. Leigh received the distinguished-service cross for his gallant and effective fight against the submarines, and Dismukes received the same honor for his remarkable skill and bravery in getting back to port with the Mount Vernon after she had been torpedoed by a German submarine. Thirty-seven men were killed by the explosion of the torpedo, but 1,300 more were on board and their lives were at stake. The successful rescue of this vessel and the brave boys on board was an act of skill and courage which entitles this brave Mississippi officer and his coworkers not only to the gratitude and admiration of all true Americans but to a permanent place in American history.

Thus we see that Mississippi has contributed her full quota of the brave men and gallant officers who have given or sacrificed their lives to the defense of their country.

But "Peace hath her victories more renowned than those of war." Let it be remembered that from the time of our admission into the Union we have been sending men to Washington who have won honor for their State and contributed generously to the public weal. A distinguished Washingtonian said to me, "It has become proverbial the strong men that Mississippi sends to the National Capital."

In the early period of our statehood came S. S. Prentiss, prince of American orators. We gave worthy and distinguished Cabinet members to the administrations of Pierce, Buchanan, and Cleveland, in the persons of Jefferson Davis, Jacob Thompson, and L. Q. C. Lamar.

At one time seven Members of the United States Senate were native sons of Mississippi—a record which no other State has made. And Senator KEY PITTMAN stated to me here in one of our Mississippi Society meetings that when he entered the Senate the governor and both of the United States Senators from Nevada were native Mississippians.

Mr. Fitts, Assistant Attorney General under Woodrow Wilson, said in a public speech that no other State in the Union has sent to the Senate four men equal to Mississippi's "immortal four"—Jefferson Davis, E. C. Walthall, L. Q. C. Lamar, and J. Z. George—and now we may well add the name of John Sharp Williams, making it Mississippi's "immortal five."

A distinguished ex-governor of Virginia has called my attention to the fact that Mississippi has kept at least one outstanding nationally known man in the Senate for a longer time than any other State has ever done. It began, as he said, with Jefferson Davis 75 years ago, and except for the period of the Civil War and reconstruction the chain is unbroken down to this day. In regular succession they have come—Davis, Walthall, Lamar, George, Money, Williams, and Harrison. All have rendered such service and filled such places in national affairs as to make their names known in every State of the Union. Grover Cleveland said to a Virginia Senator, "L. Q. C. Lamar has more ability than any other man I know," and Elihu Root said to this Virginia governor, "I would not say who is the ablest man in the United States Senate, but I will say that the best Senator there is Money, of Mississippi." I place the higher value on these statements because they have not come from Mississippians but have come to me from a real Virginia statesman, for whom I have great admiration and in whom I have great confidence. But before we leave the Senate, let me say in my own name, no man who observes the "upper House" can fail to see that Mississippi's junior Senator, HUBERT D. STEPHENS, is winning an unusual reputation for effective service and is coming very rapidly to that recognition which seems to be the due of Mississippians in that great deliberative assembly.

As you will observe I have, as I purposed, discussed only those citizens of our State who have distinguished themselves in political and military service and in connection with national affairs. Scores of others have won reputation in business, in literature, in educational and religious activities, and in the political affairs of their own State. Not a lack of appreciation but brevity of time prevents our mentioning them to-night and paying them the tribute of our love and admiration.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON] may be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that to-morrow, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON] be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

NATURALIZATION

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on H. R. 349, a bill dealing with naturalization and legalization.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, the Senate made considerable changes in the naturalization act proposed by the House, striking out all after the enacting clause, and making a very thoroughgoing revision of the existing laws relating to the naturalization of aliens who have not been properly admitted into the United States.

When the bill was returned to the House, the Committee on Immigration, through its chairman, proposed seven changes in the bill as passed by the Senate. These changes can be summarized as follows:

First. Changes from July 1, 1924, to June 3, 1921, the date of entry of the immigrant.

Second. Changes the words "is a person of good moral character" to "has behaved as a person of good moral character at all times since such entry."

Third. Adds a provision for a photograph to be given to an alien who has qualified under the foregoing provisions.

Fourth. Makes the official date of his entry from the date of the register instead of the Senate provision, making it date from the date of the original admission.

Fifth. Requires new declarations of intention after registry, old declaration of intentions declared invalid.

Sixth. Provides any naturalized citizen taking an oath of allegiance to a foreign country to lose his citizenship.

Seventh. A photograph shall be required on each certificate of entry.

My present remarks will be addressed to these proposed changes.

The first change made by the House was to enable the Commissioner General of Immigration to legalize the entry of all immigrants who have arrived in the United States prior to July 1, 1924. The House wants to make that change as of June 3, 1921, which is the date of the original quota law.

I am opposed to this change of date, which the Committee on Immigration of the House saw fit to impose, as against the Senate provision making July 1, 1924, the effective date, at which time the alien must have been properly admitted if he is to take advantage of our naturalization laws.

The situation briefly is as follows:

Formerly there was much less attention paid to recording our aliens entering into the United States than is the case to-day. The result is that thousands of aliens have come into this country openly and above board without any record of their entry being made.

Most of these people fall into two groups. They are those who came over our land boundaries, particularly from Canada, without our immigration inspectors making any inspection of them. Examination of immigrants was not done as thoroughly then as it is now. Up to 1907 there was no head tax imposed on a Canadian or on a person who had lived in Canada for one year, and this absence of any financial obligation connected with entrance led to laxness in registering aliens. Furthermore and more important, the provision of the naturalization law of 1906 requiring registering of all aliens who had entered the United States after June 29, 1906, was overlooked for a number of years by the administrators of the immigration law. It was overlooked because this provision is a section of the law regulating naturalization and not a part of our immigration laws.

As a result many persons entered from Canada without being registered. People drove over the border in buggies or came in on trains without even seeing an immigration inspector. Responsibility for this situation rests clearly on our Government and not on the immigrant, who was innocent of any intention of violating our laws.

The other group, which is large, comprises those who came in as seamen at a time when our seamen's laws were not as strict as they are to-day, and who have left their vessels and went to work in the United States, remaining here permanently. Of course, there is no record of their entry, although these men clearly did not intend to enter this country illegally.

There are also aliens who were brought here in infancy and who can give no information as to the place or date of their entry. These people, for the most part, have settled down in our country, have taken their places in our commercial industrial life, have married and raised families, and have become respected members of our communities, and yet, strictly speaking, they can not be deemed to be admitted legally and, technically speaking, are improperly in the United States.

The legal situation confronting these aliens is as follows:

The naturalization law of 1906 requires an immigrant seeking citizenship to furnish a certificate of arrival. The only way he can meet this requirement, unless he can establish the fact that he had entered the country prior to 1906 and has since continuously resided here, is through the official record of his entry. If there is no such record, he is without any legal status as a resident alien, other than the fact that he is not subject to deportation, provided he has resided here continuously for three years or five years, as the case may be. We suffer him to remain, but as a sort of a legal outcast. This means that he can not become a citizen. It means that he can not obtain a permit for reentry. If he should leave the United States for a visit or on temporary work, he might be prevented from returning until he had obtained an immigration visa, which, on account of full quotas, might hold him up for several years. If he should make such a trip out of the country, should return and this fact should be discovered at any time thereafter, under the provisions of the 1924 law, he might be subject to deportation as an illegal entrant.

The change, as has been said, is of the date from which this entry is to be made legal, rather than on the principles of the bill itself.

The Senate very properly fixed the date as of July 1, 1924. This was the date which was continually recommended by our Secretary of Labor, and I am now quoting from his report in 1927:

> I can not too strongly urge it upon the Congress. The legislation to accomplish it should take the form of a statute to give authority to the administrative officer to give legal domicile to aliens who entered the United States prior to July 1, 1924, the effective date of the present quota immigration law, upon showing in appropriate hearing that they are not subject to deportation on any other grounds and that they meet the certain required standards.

The United States Chamber of Commerce in the report of its chairman urges that legalization be as of July 1, 1924. The Foreign Language Information Service urges likewise July 1, 1924, as the effective date of this proposed legislation. The Council on Adult Education for the Foreign Born urges the passage of this act. In fact, it is the desire of all those who are interested in a proper solution of this difficult question that this law be made effective as of July 1, 1924, rather than June 3, 1921.

The reason for it is obvious. Our permanent quota policy was fixed on July 1, 1924. From that date on we have very accurate, comprehensive, and complete records of every alien who entered the United States. Those who came before that day can not now be deported. It is therefore obvious that if we do not legalize the entry of these aliens who have established their residence in the United States prior to July 1, 1924, we will be making of them men without a country. I do not believe that Congress seriously intends to do anything of the kind.

I shall quote from the report of the immigration committee of the United States Chamber of Commerce two instances, typical of many which have come to light and of many others which may at any time, which will reveal the hardships arising out of our failure to remedy a condition for which our own previous lax administration of our immigration laws is largely responsible.

A minister who came to this country from Canada in 1916. He has been preaching in one of our Middle West States for more than 10 years. He is established there. He is educating his children there. He has applied for citizenship. There is no record of his entry. He came into the country quite openly. He says that he did not see an immigration officer when he came in, and there is no reason to doubt his word. The Commissioner of Immigration is powerless to do anything about it. The man, a respected member of his community, desirous of being an American citizen, can remain here, but as a man without a country. If he ever leaves the United States, he becomes subject to all our immigration laws, without reference to the actual fact that he has lived here for years, that he is a part of our life, and to all intent an American citizen.

An Englishman, who is an accountant employed by one of our well-known concerns in a position of responsibility and trust. He came in openly from Canada. No record of his entry was made. He has been in the country 19 years. He has educated his children here. There has never been any question in his mind about the legality of his entry. His children have been brought up as Americans and he has long since regarded himself as an American. He applied for citizenship to discover that he can not become a citizen.

The fact that he has lived here 19 years, an honest, useful member of the community, can not offset the fact that there is no record of his entry. He discovered not only that we can not accept him as a citizen, but as a result of his visits on business to Canada we are compelled to deport him, or maybe as an illegal entrant. It is difficult to find words to condemn an injustice of this kind.

The other changes made by the House, which I have summarized above, are not as important as this change of the date of legalization of our unlawful entries. While much might be said against this wholesale addition of new provisions concerning photographs, identification cards, and all such other paraphernalia having to do with the mechanics of the naturalization law rather than with the merits of an alien's application for citizenship, I prefer not to discuss them in detail because of the importance which I am attaching to this one change made, which should be given very thoughtful attention and full consideration by the House.

AMENDMENT OF THE NATIONAL PROHIBITION ACT

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate bill 2901, to amend the national prohibition act, as amended and supplemented.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Dakota moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate bill 2901.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Under the rule the time allowed for the consideration of this bill is fixed at one hour, one half to be controlled by the sponsors of the bill and the other half to be controlled by the opposition. Now, I understand there is no one on the committee who is opposed to the bill. Therefore, I claim control of the time in opposition to it.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Under the rule it is true that the one hour is to be divided equally between the proponents and opponents of the bill, but it is quite usual that if there is opposition on the minority side the time be placed in the control of that opposition. It just happens that the member of the committee who would oppose the bill is in the hospital. Therefore, I suggest that the fair thing to do is to divide the opposition between those on each side.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. May I suggest that I have divided such opposition many times but have gotten nowhere?

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time may be equally divided, that I control one half the time and that the gentleman who secures recognition in opposition to the bill control the other half of the time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman care to name any gentleman in his request? The rule does all the gentleman is now asking and the Chair suggests that the gentleman name some Member to control half the time.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I claim recognition to control half the time in opposition to the bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that is fair. I think the minority should be represented, and that not all of the time should be controlled on the majority side.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, if no agreement is entered into and we go into the Committee of the Whole, recognition will be in the hands of the Chair, and the Chair necessarily gives priority of recognition to members of the committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair agrees that that is so, but in this case it seems to the Chair that it might be agreed that some Member on the majority side should be allowed to control the opposition.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] is a member of the Judiciary Committee. He has filed minority views and I think he should control the time of those in opposition to the legislation.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Mr. Speaker, I amend my request by asking that the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] may control half the time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that one-half of the hour be controlled by himself in favor of the legislation and one-half by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] in opposition. Is there objection?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York and Mr. O'CONNELL objected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the House shall resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole without an agreement as to the control of the time, would it result that the gentleman from South Dakota will be recognized for one-half hour and then that some other gentleman in opposition will be recognized for one-half hour?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SNELL). The present occupant of the chair would think that the chairman of the committee would have control and it would be in his discretion whom he would recognize for the other half hour.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Under the rule?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, then what is the purpose of the agreement?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. To fix the time.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. The time is fixed by the rule, but I understood the motion was by the gentleman from South Dakota that the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] would have one-half hour in opposition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That was the unanimous-consent request that was objected to.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. If we go into committee without any agreement——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Dakota will have 30 minutes, and it will be in the discretion of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole whom he shall recognize.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Will I have the right to yield part of the 30 minutes granted me?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes; the gentleman can yield any part of the one-half hour he desires.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 2901) to amend the national prohibition act as amended, and supplement it, with Mr. BEGG in the chair.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That wherever a penalty or penalties are prescribed in a criminal prosecution by the national prohibition act, as amended and supplemented, for the illegal manufacture, sale, transportation, importation, or exportation of intoxicating liquor, as defined by section 1, Title II, of the national prohibition act, the penalty imposed for each such offense shall be a fine not to exceed $10,000 or imprisonment not to exceed five years, or both: Provided, That it is the intent of Congress that the court, in imposing sentence hereunder, should discriminate between casual or slight violations and habitual sales of intoxicating liquor, or attempts to commercialize violations of the law.

SEC. 2. This act shall not repeal nor eliminate any minimum penalty for the first or any subsequent offense now provided by the said national prohibition act.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Mr. Chairman, as was stated yesterday in the argument on the rule, the purpose of this bill is to increase the penalties provided in the national prohibition act.

Experience has demonstrated that heavier penalties are necessary. The department believes that the amendment proposed in this bill will aid in the enforcement of the act and that it will help the courts in the administration of the national prohibition act.

I hope the measure will have the approval of the House.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LAGUARDIA and Mr. O'CONNOR of New York rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Chairman, I demand recognition in opposition to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman a member of the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. No.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I demand recognition as a member of the Judiciary Committee in opposition to the bill now before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule which has been adopted, there is one hour of general debate, to be equally divided and controlled by those favoring and those opposing the bill. The Chair is without any hesitancy in stating that the custom as well as the practice of the House has always been that the member of the committee asking recognition in opposition to the bill is accorded such recognition.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, may I submit an inquiry? Will the gentleman having control of the time in opposition yield any time on this side?

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, the Chair can not answer that question.

Mr. CELLER. May I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] that question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York care to be questioned?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the gentleman from New York is recognized in opposition to the bill, he will send forth his best guns and his heaviest artillery? [Laughter.]

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. In connection with a parliamentary suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not care for any suggestions.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. May I state in this connection as a parliamentary inquiry, is it not also the custom in this House that the minority be recognized? If, for instance, the gentleman from New York [Mr. WELLER], who is in a hospital, were here, he would be in opposition to this bill, and if he rose, together with the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], I submit that the gentleman from New York [Mr. WELLER], being on the minority side of the House, would be recognized in opposition. Because that gentleman does not happen to be here, I submit that the minority of nearly 200 Members should be represented in opposition to this bill, and that both sides should not be represented by the Republican side of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state we are operating under a special rule, and the rule provides that the proponents and the opponents shall have control of the time equally. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] represents the opposition.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. So do I.

The CHAIRMAN. And being a member of the committee, under the practice of the House——

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Chairman, I beg leave to submit that we have brought out rules which have stated, if I recall correctly, that the member of the committee in opposition should have control of the time or we have named men in the rule itself who should represent both sides, but this rule just refers to those in opposition and does not say anything about the committee.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Maryland rise?

Mr. LINTHICUM. To submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The rule says we shall have one hour of general debate. It does not say that that one hour shall be divided equally between one gentleman opposing it and another gentleman in favor of it. I thought that left the time in the control of the Chair, and the Chair would apportion the time.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Maryland will read the rule he will find it provides that the one hour shall be equally divided and controlled by those favoring and opposing the measure.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes; by those favoring and opposing and not by any two Members to allot the time themselves.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, as I understand, we have in this division of the wet bloc an example of a division of the irreducible minimum.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, another parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. If the Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York, for what time is he recognized; one-half hour?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; for 30 minutes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Then the gentleman has the right to allot that time himself?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the decision of the Chair.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I understood the rule left the time in the hands of the Chairman to apportion among those favoring and those opposing and not that it was to be divided into two equal parts and given to two gentlemen to control.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has ruled otherwise.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] yield for a question?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, is this being taken out of my time?

The CHAIRMAN. The time starts now and the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] is recognized for one-half hour.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I can not yield. Mr. Chairman, the bill before the committee is very important. It is highly penal in its character. It is more important than any ward politics for home consumption.

I reserve the balance of my time, and I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. IRWIN].

Mr. IRWIN. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for a few minutes to-day to voice my protest against the provisions of this monstrosity—this so-called amendment to our present prohibition laws. In studying its provisions I am firmly convinced that it is contrary to the letter and spirit of the Constitution of the United States, which sets out that "excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted." My friends, where are we drifting in passing such legislation? This bill makes it a felony for a man driving along the public highway with a half pint of liquor on his person for his own personal use, and not for sale, punishable by five years in the penitentiary and a fine of $10,000. I appeal to the better judgment of the Members of this body to think seriously before voting to pass such hysterical legislation. By its drastic provisions, a farmer who drives to town with a gallon of cider for a friend might be sent to the penitentiary for five years and made to pay a fine of $10,000. I know what the proponents of this bill will say in justification of the measure; that it is aimed at the bootlegger and commercialized prohibition offender, and that the bill is so worded that it is left to the discretion of the Federal judges to determine the degree of punishment to be meted out to the offender, and that the minimum penalties still remain in the statute. But my friends, stop and think for a moment what power you are giving Federal judges—the power to send a man or a woman to the penitentiary for five years and pay a fine of $10,000 if found guilty of making a pint of home-brew for their own use. My friends, only a few days ago we listened to the splendid address delivered on the floor of this Chamber by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK], former Solicitor General of the United States, eulogizing the life and character of George Washington, and in which he particularly pointed out the dangers, as feared by Washington, of breaking down the Constitution of the United States by injudicious legislation. And to-day we are asked to do this very thing by the proponents of this nefarious bill. I implore you in the name of the Constitution of our country, and its flag we all love and honor, not to place on the statute books such a law which permits a punishment of five years' imprisonment in the penitentiary and a fine of $10,000 for the first offender of the prohibition law, no matter what might be the circumstances in the individual case. Such a law would place the first offender in the same category with the murderer, the rapist, or a man who robs a train or burglarizes a bank. It is unthinkable to pass such a law in the name of law enforcement. Are we going back to the days of barbarism and are we placing ourselves in the same class with Russia, who sent her prisoners to the mines of Siberia for life for infractions of her laws? There must be something radically wrong with the prohibition law if, in order to enforce its provisions, we must resort to such drastic, un-American legislation as is contained in the bill we are now considering.

I have always had the most profound respect for Federal courts and Federal judges, but I will call the attention of this House to what has transpired here in the past few days, namely, that resolutions have been introduced to investigate the conduct of two Federal judges in one of our near-by States. I also point out to the membership of this House that only a few months ago the House voted to impeach a Federal judge in my own State for misconduct in office. Now, in view of these facts which are a matter of record, my faith in some Federal judges has been somewhat weakened. So, my friends, I think it is unwise to give to Federal judges the great power such as is given them in this bill. I believe that a Federal law should state what it means and that Federal judges should not be required to interpret the intent of Congress. Many judges, conscientious, humane, and with a sympathetic heart, can give a first offender of the prohibition laws a 30-day jail sentence with a fine of $200 in one section of the country, while in some other part of this country a hard-boiled Federal judge for the same identical offense may send such offender to the penitentiary for five years and fine him $10,000. In conclusion, I again ask you to vote down this unwise and un-American legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, after discussion and education for almost a century, the eighteenth amendment became a part of the Constitution of the United States. Under section 2 of that amendment it therefore became our duty in the Congress to pass the prohibition enforcement act. That act, in respect to the increasing of penalties therein, is before us for amendment. You will recall that the eighteenth amendment had in it five provisions referring to the manufacture, sale, importation, exportation, and transportation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes. This bill deals with those five things which the eighteenth amendment prohibits.

Several penalties are provided in the prohibition enforcement act. One of the penalties which is quite generally used and which will be affected by this bill is section 29, a portion of which follows:

> Any person who manufactures or sells liquor in violation of this title shall for a first offense be fined not more than $1,000, or imprisoned not exceeding six months, and for a second or subsequent offense shall be fined not less than $200 nor more than $2,000 and be imprisoned not less than one month nor more than five years.

It will be observed from the above section that the maximum penalty for a first offense is a fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment not exceeding six months.

If this bill should become a law, it would not affect the minimum penalty that might be imposed, but it would increase the maximum penalty to $10,000 or imprisonment for five years, or both.

We are told by representatives from the Department of Justice who are responsible for the enforcement of prohibition that the penalties in the enforcement act in many instances are inadequate, and that many of the violators who carry on an illegal traffic in intoxicating liquors are not deterred by the small penalties. The object of this legislation is to increase the maximum penalty in order that adequate punishment may be meted out to one who is commercializing the traffic in intoxicating liquors. This is not aimed at the small offender but for the larger violators with the belief and expectation that a maximum prison sentence of five years or a fine of $10,000, or both, will go a long way toward breaking up these illegal practices.

We ought to be fair in this discussion. It seems to me that some of the opponents are quite unfair. They speak of these extreme penalties and hold up some imaginary case of a boy or girl technically violating the law, and intimating that judges in a case like that would give the extreme penalty. Under the law now there could be a thousand dollar fine or imprisonment for six months, but who has ever heard during the whole time prohibition has been in effect of any judge imposing the maximum penalty in trivial cases? Judges must of necessity have and ought to have good common sense among other qualifications, and most of them do. I believe they can be trusted to impose this penalty upon offenders and apply the maximum penalty only where it should be used. Some discretion must be left to the judge, for I think it is apparent to everyone that we can not in a law work out a graduated scale of fines that would cover all situations.

For several years the proposition contained in this bill of increasing penalties has been before the Judiciary Committee of the House. We have held hearings and this has not been done in haste. However, this bill has passed the Senate, and because only a few days of this session of the Congress remain, it seems to me advisable to accept this bill without amendment, although I would have preferred to have made some minor changes.

Prohibition is, as has been well said, a noble effort. Throughout the years in the public schools and elsewhere the children were taught scientific temperance. Various methods have been provided to attempt to control the liquor traffic. Until there is something better, the eighteenth amendment is in the Constitution to stay. We concede the right to amend it in the way provided in the Constitution but not to nullify it while it remains in the Constitution. We should give proper encouragement to its enforcement. I believe it is the sentiment of the House that we shall do this.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Ohio. No; I have only a few minutes. I am amazed at the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR], who spoke yesterday. Very soon he will want to offer dilatory amendments to this bill. I thought as I listened to his unusual and amazing words yesterday that when he came to revise his remarks they would be taken out and would not appear in the RECORD, but here they are. He says:

> I am against the eighteenth amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the eighteenth amendment is in the Constitution, adopted by the States of the Union in the prescribed way. It is a part of the Constitution. Therefore, the gentleman from New York is against the Constitution. He further says:

> I abhor it. I despise it. I have no respect for it.

And then he says concerning the prohibition enforcement act:

> I would not counsel anybody to even respect the law.

That is the situation, and he is the gentleman who will be offering amendments to this bill which aims to carry out our constitutional duty as representatives of the people.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MOORE of Ohio. Not now. Mr. Chairman, I have great respect for the distinguished lady from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON]. I want to be polite and courteous in what I say about her remarks during the debate on this bill, but even though a lady said it, for one I shall not let go unchallenged her statement that reflects upon the sobriety and the good name of this House. For several years I have associated with and observed the membership of this House, and I say upon my responsibility as a legislator that they have respect for the law, and the large number, generally speaking, of the Congress of the United States observe it and believe in its observance. [Applause.]

The Republican Party in its platform in the last campaign, when this question was frequently discussed, stated:

> The people, through the method provided by the Constitution, have written the eighteenth amendment into the Constitution. The Republican Party pledges itself and its nominees to the observance and vigorous enforcement of this provision of the Constitution.

We have elected a President who will carry on under that instruction. The law-enforcement officers who will work under him will also do this, if we strengthen this law and increase the maximum penalty, so that we shall not hamper those who have the responsibility of enforcing the law.

My friends, the prohibition law is not the only law that is violated. It was pointed out by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] yesterday that in our Federal prison at Atlanta there are more there who have violated the narcotic laws, there are more there who have violated the law relating to the theft of automobiles than the prohibition law. The trouble with the American people to-day is that we like to violate the law that suits our convenience. What we need is respect for the law, for all laws, for the Constitution as it is written, and the laws under it that we make to enforce it. This, indeed, is a noble effort, I repeat. After years of education and agitation we are determined to make every proper effort to enforce the law. Nobody defends the saloon to-day, which debauched the manhood and pauperized the womanhood and childhood of the Nation.

Why eternally bring the young people into the picture every time we discuss prohibition? The lady from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON] says:

> We are tired of this hypocrisy that is ruining our boys and girls, who are cynically watching the farce.

My friends, because of the insinuations against the young people of this country I take occasion at this time to resent on their behalf these innuendoes. It was stated these young people were now "cynically" looking on. I take it, Mr. Chairman, that they are watching to see whether we will have respect for the law, whether we will observe the law. I believe that the young people of to-day are the cleanest, the brightest, and the best young people that have ever lived in any age at any time. If their elders respect and observe the law, the boys and girls will be all right.

Mr. Chairman, in the interest of good government, in the interest of law enforcement, in the interest of law observance, I appeal to the House to place on the statute books this bill without amendment that we may encourage and strengthen the arm of the law that has to do with the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DEAL].

Mr. DEAL. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to appeal to the mercy of those who hold to the extreme view with respect to the enforcement of the prohibition law, because history teaches us that through all time it is useless to make such an appeal. That element of society has always proven implacable, unrelenting, and uncompromising. This may be said with equal propriety of those who take the extreme view on the other side of this question. I do not appeal to those who may not agree with the proposed legislation, but who will support it because they feel that a majority of their constituents favor it, because we all realize that self-preservation is the first law of nature, and political expediency is with them paramount. But when it is demanded that we shall obey the eighteenth amendment because it is written in the Constitution, I rise to demand that we shall respect the fourth amendment to the Constitution, which is as much a part of that instrument—just as sacred, just as binding—as the eighteenth amendment; I rise to demand that the fifth amendment to the Constitution shall be respected, with respect to confiscation of property, and with respect to double trials for the same offense which have occurred. I demand full respect for the provisions of Article VI of the Constitution, which provides for jury trials. I demand that the Constitution shall be respected in the matter of excessive fines, excessive bail bonds, and cruel and unusual punishments. All of these provisions in our Bill of Rights, amounting to eight, have been violated by our Government enforcement officials in their efforts to enforce the prohibition laws. They are each as sacred and binding upon us as the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution. Yet we hear no demand by the advocates of prohibition that these provisions of our Constitution be enforced. In the one case it is treason to violate the Constitution (eighteenth amendment); in the other it is necessary in order to enforce the sacred eighteenth. Who are the nullificationists?

Gentlemen have spoken to this bill and suggested that we can trust our courts with the discretion of enforcing this law. I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that we should leave it to the discretion of any judge as to what kind and extent of punishment he should mete out in these matters. Have we forgotten that there have been judges who have abused their trusts? History records a number of such, and all men do not entertain the same views with respect to these questions.

We abolished the saloons. The majority of us were in favor of that legislation. One of the greatest reasons for our objection to the saloon, and one of the greatest evils incident thereto, was its participation in politics and its demand that they should regulate and control our representatives in the State legislatures, in our city councils, our prosecuting attorneys, and even the judges of the courts.

We eliminated this evil only to substitute in its stead city councilmen, representatives in State and National Legislatures, prosecuting attorneys, and judges largely named and controlled by the Anti-Saloon League. Have we improved the situation? We are all human; but the milk of human kindness is no more in evidence under the dominance of the Anti-Saloon League than under that of the saloon. Indeed, we never heard of the saloon demanding that men be shot down who fled from arrest for petty offenses, or that human beings be imprisoned for life for misdemeanors committed. The saloon, with all of its evils—and there were many—never sought to break down and destroy our bill of rights in order to carry out its views. This proposed legislation is unsound, and it will not accomplish the end sought. Already the demand has been made that any amount of money shall be appropriated and more drastic laws enacted if necessary to compel those who do not agree and conform to their views. Both will be necessary. We will undoubtedly reach the day when homes will be searched and capital punishment demanded. Even so, if the lessons of history are to be reckoned as a guide, sumptuary laws will not prevail. In the early part of the seventeenth century England, by statutory law or an edict by the Crown—I do not now recall which—prohibited the importation of silks. Macaulay tells us that while the Government officials were supposed to be exercising the greatest vigilance in the enforcement of the law, French silks were offered for sale in the House of Parliament. Gentlemen upon this floor can determine whether or not conditions in and around our Capitol furnish a parallel. The penalty for violation of the English law was death, and Macaulay tells us it was a matter of common remark that it would require a gibbet upon each one-fourth of a mile of the eastern coast of England to prevent the smuggling, notwithstanding the fact that the British and Dutch fleets were constantly patrolling the Channel. The same was true in France with respect to smuggling; but the law could not be enforced, because the enforcement officers became the smugglers. Are we not finding a parallel in the Union to-day? Great profits in bootlegging have been revealed, in some instances aggregating millions of dollars. An analysis of human nature reveals that men and women, too, will face death where gain can be obtained. Advocates of prohibition close their eyes to these facts. Perhaps the same motives that prompt the bootlegger to ply his trade is behind the leaders of prohibition—money.

I deny the allegation made by some upon this floor that those who object to and oppose the eighteenth amendment and Volstead law are disloyal to the Government. We have a right to oppose any amendment to the Constitution or any law and seek its repeal and yet be quite as loyal to our Government as any other citizen, be he prohibitionist, minister of the gospel, or otherwise. Those who make this charge are, in the main, those who demand the violation and scuttling of our Bill of Rights in order to enforce the only law which they seem to consider of moment.

The extravagance of views advanced by this school of thought is evidenced in the wholesale claim that the great prosperity realized in our country since the war is due to prohibition. I have only to point to the great increase of money that flowed to our country from Europe as a result of the war, the increase by 100 per cent of wages, the increase in commodity prices in industry, and our great increase in exports to show the fallacy of this claim. Are there any so gullible as to believe that less alcohol is being consumed for beverage purposes or that less money is being expended therefor? The crowding of our jails, 75,000 arrests during the past year, Government reports of smuggling across our borders, illicit distilleries within our borders, especially in the so-called dry States, all belie the claim. Nor is this all: The total gallons of grain alcohol manufactured in the United States has increased rather than decreased. The production in 1912 was 7,630,032.8 gallons, one of the peak years of alcoholic beverage consumption. In 1927 the production was 184,000,000 gallons, an amount exceeded only during the war year of 1917. There is absolutely nothing to indicate that human consumption of alcohol has been decreased. We have merely driven it from the saloon into the home and behind closed doors.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. STALKER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. STALKER. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, the bill now before us (S. 2901) is similar to a bill which I introduced in the House.

I offered the following amendment to my bill (H. R. 9588) by introducing H. R. 12002:

SEC. 2. This act shall not in any way change or eliminate the minimum penalties now provided by the said national prohibition act for second or subsequent offenses, nor change or eliminate the civil penalties now imposed because of law violations.

In the bill now under consideration (S. 2901) the intention is to keep in the national prohibition act all the penalties referred to in section 2 of H. R. 12002 by inserting the words "criminal prosecution," on page 1, line 4, and adding section 2.

While I prefer the language of my own bill, I fully appreciate that if any amendments were adopted to the bill now under consideration it would be fatal to this legislation.

When the Volstead Act was adopted it was the thought of those in charge of the legislation to provide lenient penalties until the people had an opportunity to become familiar with the law. Certainly this time has arrived, and it now behooves Congress to increase the penalties to correspond with the violation. As a matter of fact, in the days prior to the eighteenth amendment, when we were legislating for revenue only, the penalties imposed because of law violations were much greater than those written into the Volstead Act. I shall only take the time of the House to refer to a few of the penalties, which were provided for in the revenue laws.

Section 3257, where a distiller attempted to defraud on any tax on spirits there was a minimum fine of $500 and six months in jail; a maximum of $5,000 and three years.

Section 3258, just possessing a still or any distilling apparatus without having registered it, there was a minimum punishment of $100 and one month in jail; a maximum of $1,000 and two years.

Section 3259, carrying on the business of a distiller without sending notice to the collector—just such an oversight as that—there was a minimum penalty of $100 and six months; and a maximum penalty of $1,000 and two years.

Section 3260, failing to give a proper bond, a minimum fine of $500 and six months; a maximum of $5,000 and two years.

Section 3266, distilling on prohibited premises, a minimum penalty of $1,000 and six months; a maximum of two years.

Section 3268, breaking or tampering in any manner with locks that were put on by internal-revenue agents, a minimum of $100 and one year; a maximum of $5,000 and three years.

Section 3229, using any notices, signs, around a distillery, minimum $1,000 and one month; maximum six months.

Section 3281, carrying on the business of a distiller without giving bond, minimum, $1,000 and six months; maximum, $5,000 and two years.

Section 3282, making any mash fit for distillation on other than registered distillery premises, minimum, $500 and six months; maximum, $5,000 and two years.

Section 3296, removing or concealing or covering up of spirits contrary to law, a minimum of $200 and three months; a maximum of $5,000 and three years.

Section 3305, making any false entries in the books that were kept, a minimum punishment of $500 and six months; maximum, $5,000 and two years.

Section 3306, using any false weights or measures, minimum, $500 and one year; maximum, $5,000 and three years.

Section 3317, carrying on the business of a rectifier, or removing rectified spirits contrary to law, a minimum of $1,000 and six months; maximum $5,000 and two years.

Section 3318, failing to keep books as a rectifier or wholesale distiller, minimum $100 and three months; maximum $5,000 to three years.

Section 3326, changing or altering any mark or brand on cask or any kind of package, minimum $100 and one month; maximum $1,000 to one year.

Section 3330, relanding spirits that were shipped for export, a fine not to exceed $5,000 (no minimum there, but it is in the conjunctive) and not more than three years.

The enforcement of the liquor laws has been a grave problem for generations. Tell me how long a dealer has been engaged in the liquor business, and I will tell you how long he has been a habitual violator of the law. The difficulty in enforcing the eighteenth amendment is due largely to the small penalties provided for in the act. In most cases they are less than the annual license fee was in the days of the legal saloon. Many of our city ordinances provide a penalty for spitting on the sidewalk almost equal to the penalty which Congress has written into the national prohibition act for violating the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. Chairman and Members of the House, this legislation has the approval of the office of the Attorney General, the Treasury Department, including the Commissioner of Prohibition, and all dry organizations.

It is the duty of Congress to provide penalties that correspond with the violations, and our neglect to do so up to this time has placed a grave doubt in the minds of the people as to whether or not Congress really desired the national prohibition act to succeed. This is a very important piece of legislation, and I trust that the bill will pass. [Applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COMBS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. COMBS. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, my opposition to this bill is predicated on the fact that I believe it to be a thoroughly unscientific piece of legislation. Regardless of what laws we seek to enforce, in the past we have always made some effort, at least, to classify penal infractions, to graduate punishment, and to determine the measure of its severity by the measure of the seriousness of the offense. There is in this bill absolutely no legislative discrimination between a serious offense and a purely casual offense. There is no splitting of the offense in accordance with the practice which has been recognized as the only sound juridical policy governing penal infractions of the law.

I am fully aware of the fact that there has been added to the bill a proviso which seeks to declare the intent of Congress. From a legal standpoint every man in this room knows that the proviso is in no sense binding upon any court charged with the duty of enforcing this law. It is absolutely without significance. We can declare our intent until the cows come home, and yet if the court elects to construe and administer the law in accordance with his prejudice rather than in conformity to the plain intent of Congress, he is at liberty to do so. We have the disheartening spectacle of Congress rushing through a sloppy piece of legislation, inserting a proviso that is both unscientific, and without legal validity, and realizing, as we must realize, that we are stultifying ourselves in so doing.

The problem confronting the American people is primarily one of enforcement. You can not obtain enforcement in wet communities by hurling in their faces legislation which the people of those districts know can be so construed by the courts as to constitute a cruel injustice. Public sentiment is the only real motivating force behind any law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman,, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM]. [Applause.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I realize it is entirely futile to oppose this bill. It is destined to pass no matter what may be said against it—that it is poorly drawn and crudely expressed, the ablest lawyers supporting it have admitted. For instance, note the expression in line 4, the words "criminal prosecution" is used. This portion reads as follows: "The penalty or penalties prescribed in a criminal prosecution." Now, what lawyer ever heard of a penalty prescribed in a "criminal prosecution"? I presume what was intended and meant was the "violation of criminal statutes"; certainly not a penalty or penalties for a criminal prosecution. This is only an example of the draftsmanship of this bill.

Forty-three Members of this House petitioned the Judiciary Committee for a hearing upon this measure, and not only were refused a hearing, but no response was even made to the petition. I presume it went into the ash can.

I believe in temperance, not in prohibition. I do not believe that prohibition and temperance can exist in the same community or country. The moment you try to prohibit a man in the freedom which he loves so dearly, just that soon you incite him to a violation of the prohibition. We all know how the great number of citizens of this country are continually violating the prohibition act. It has become a game; people are desirous of obtaining liquor or of manufacturing liquor, because it is prohibited. Thousands of distilleries dot the mountain sides, thousands of speak-easies abound in the cities, exceeding in number the old saloons. Thousands of arrests are being made, and each year are increasing. The penitentiaries and jails of the country are crowded so that in Atlanta and Leavenworth they are sleeping two in each cell and many in the corridors, the result of which is that more penitentiaries are recommended by the National Government, by a committee appointed by Congress, and many of the States are contemplating the erection of jails and penitentiaries.

The Government has resorted to all manner of means for the enforcement of prohibition. Poisons have been placed in alcohol; many people have lost their lives by reason thereof, to say nothing of those who have been affected by blindness and other physical ailments.

This act is intended to increase the penalties to five years in imprisonment or $10,000 fine, and I venture to say will have just as little effect as all these other measures for enforcement have had. The heavier the penalty, the fewer prosecutions you are likely to have, because witnesses will not be willing to testify against a violator when the witness realizes it may mean five years in jail or $10,000 fine. Juries will not be willing to convict when they realize that the man who sits upon the bench—the judge—has it within his power to thus severely fine or incarcerate the prisoner.

I have just read of one of the big counties of our country which has in force a local option law in addition to the Volstead Act. Yet it is unable to enforce prohibition. Recently 250 witnesses were examined and 83 indictments returned, but the grand jury stated that "hardly had the surface, in so far as bootlegging was concerned, been scratched," and went on to say that in view of the extent of the evil, the reluctance of witnesses to testify, their willingness to protect violations of the law, and the general difficulties confronted in securing convictions it was not thought worth while to continue the session for the purpose of prosecuting them; in other words, there is a breakdown of the law in this dry county where power to punish exists under both State and Federal statutes.

Now, if that is the condition under the present law, what will be the effect of giving to a judge the absolute power to fine or imprison a violator five years or $10,000? Mind you, when the case goes to the jury and the witnesses testify no one can discern the mind of the judge nor the penalty he may inflict. How would you like to testify against some person you know with this great uncertainty staring you in the face? Humanity at best is subject to so many influences, the best of us have our good days and our bad days, our patient days and our impatient days. The best of us have our indigestion days when everything goes wrong; some little irritation at home or abroad may change our whole demeanor. The judge is only human, he does his best as he interprets the evidence and construes the law, but even his best may be influenced by any one of these things; and yet he is empowered to say to a first, second, or many time offender that he will send him or her to jail for five years or inflict a fine of $10,000.

I say it is putting too much power in the hands of one man. It is creating, as has been well said by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. WHITE], a "country of men and not a country of laws." I am just as anxious to see the liquor traffic and the liquor consumption cease as any man on the floor of this House. I have always believed in temperance, and lived up to it; but I do not believe you can bring it about by such measures as these nor by the practices I have alluded to by the prohibition unit.

I note that while some seventy-five millions or more have been appropriated for the enforcement of prohibition, the Coast Guard, more judges, support of more prisoners, and all other matters that go to make up for prohibition enforcement, sad to relate, in none of these appropriations have I noted one dollar to educate the people against the use of alcohol and the dire results from overuse of intoxicating liquors.

I should like to see us embark upon a system which gives the Government control of the liquor question by the Quebec system, and yet give the people light wines and beers which they may drink at home. I should like to see temperance preached in lieu of attempted prohibition enforcement. I believe with the saloons now gone, for which we are all thankful, we can bring about far better results than are now being attained under the present system. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON].

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, the pending measure simply provides a heavier fine in cases where a Federal judge feels the circumstances of the case and the demands of justice make that desirable; in other words, it makes it possible for a Federal judge, when he gets one of these big offenders before him, one who is making a great deal of money, to take a larger part of his profits away from him. That seems to cause dismay on the part of the wet bloc in the House, headed by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM], who has just spoken. It causes dismay in the hearts of Tammany, which is speaking here to-day as often as their neighbor from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] will permit them to speak.

We know that those who are most bitterly opposed to prohibition and those who most keenly desire to see the enforcement of prohibition fail are opposed to this legislation.

It is asked for by the department that has the responsibility of enforcing the law, and I hope that everyone who favors prohibition and who favors its enforcement will unite in support of this legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman from South Dakota how many more speakers he has.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. One is all I have as yet.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And one is all I have.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. The gentleman may proceed, then.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. STOBBS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for 13 minutes.

Mr. STOBBS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am very sorry that in this debate the issue has been raised of personal views on the prohibition question. It seems to me the merits of this discussion do not involve necessarily anyone's views pro and con on the question of the eighteenth amendment or the Volstead Act.

Personally, as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary and as a Member of this House, I am only too glad to vote for any legislation which will bring about a more effective enforcement of the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act, as long as the two are a part of the law of this land; but I am opposed to this particular bill because I feel it is too drastic in its nature; I feel that it is poorly drawn and that it is not going to accomplish the purposes for which it is intended.

I disagree with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] and some of the other proponents of the bill that all this bill does is simply to raise the maximum penalties and to enable a judge in a more serious case to give out a more severe penalty. If that were the situation, I would not oppose the bill, but that is not what this bill provides.

Now, just what does the bill provide? I hope you will give me your attention as I discuss one or two things right in this connection. In the first place, this bill provides that there shall be an increase in the maximum penalties for first offenses under this act. The maximum penalty now for a first offense under the present act for the sale or the manufacture of intoxicating liquor is a $1,000 fine and six months in jail. This bill provides that the maximum penalty for such first offense under the act shall be increased tenfold and shall be made $10,000 or five years in prison.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Or both.

Mr. STOBBS. Or both. That is the way this bill increases the maximum.

But, again, this bill also provides that the maximum for all first offenses is increased to $10,000 fine and five years in prison. But there are some offenses under the present act, Mr. Chairman, that do not call for any prison sentence at all. Take the college boy, who, misguided perhaps, foolish perhaps, goes to a football game with a flask on his hip. He is guilty of transporting liquor. Under the present law all that can be done to that boy is to fine him; but under this bill that boy can be given the maximum penalty of five years in prison or $10,000 fine. The maximum for that offense is increased twentyfold; and not only that, but the penalties for first offenses for possession or transporting under this act are made greater than for second and third offenses under the present law.

So when our friends talk about simply increasing the maximum, I want you to understand how the maximum is being increased and to bear this fact in mind in considering the merits of the bill.

Then, there is one other thing this bill does that is not done in the present law. All distinctions between misdemeanors and felonies are entirely wiped out at one fell swoop, and every offense under this proposed act, however trivial, is made a felony and there is no such thing as a misdemeanor. That is what the bill provides.

So I say to you I am opposed to this bill as it is drawn because of its drastic character.

But this is not all. This bill takes away all the differences in degrees of crime. It takes away any distinction in law between a trivial and a serious crime. It takes away the difference in the character of the offense and leaves it entirely in the mind of an individual judge to say what the degree of the crime shall be, and its punishment.

This is absolutely unsound and unscientific legislation.

The Congress has no right to surrender its responsibility and leave in the hands of the individual judge power to discriminate between the different classifications of crime. The composite judgment of 435 men on this floor should be at all times the final test as to what is the nature of an offense, how serious that offense shall be, and what the punishment within limits to be meted out for that offense shall be, and not leave it to the individual judge.

But the proponents of this bill will say, "We can trust the individual judge; we can depend on his sense of fairness; we can depend on all the men of the judiciary to see that this law is enforced or administered the way it ought to be administered."

The judge, under the proposed legislation, has the sole decision to make as to whether or not an offense is a trivial one or a serious one. Congress, in passing this bill, actually surrenders that privilege and that decision and puts it into the hands of the judge, and instead of having uniform administration of and defining of offenses under your liquor law throughout all the United States, if you have 300 Federal judges you are going to have 300 different methods or 300 different views on the degrees of the offenses, and there will be no uniformity. One judge will consider it a trivial offense for a college boy to go to a football game with a flask of whisky on his hip. He will say that that is a trivial offense and will give him a fine of $25, and the next judge will come along and under this proposed law he is able to give that boy a prison sentence and will give him a month in jail, and the next judge will come along and give him a sentence of three months. In other words, there is no uniformity and no classification, no tying down of the hands of the judiciary, as far as any actual legislation is concerned, with respect to the differences in the degrees of this crime, and there is absolutely no way that you can control the judges in whatever decision they may make. Their decision is absolutely final.

Then, there is another angle of this bill that I would like to discuss for a moment, and that is the question of the unscientific manner in which the bill has been drawn.

If you will turn your attention to section 2 of this bill you will see that nothing in this bill—or whatever the language may be—shall in any way eliminate what they call the minimum penalty for the first or any subsequent violation of the law. Now what does that mean? What they intended to say, without any doubt, Mr. Speaker, was that whenever it happens there is a minimum offense described for the violation of law, for a second offense the judge must impose at least the minimum sentence prescribed. They do not say, however, that the penalties now described in the law for second offenses shall be retained—they say the minimum penalty—using the singular—shall not be eliminated. Instead of providing under the second paragraph or clause when a man commits an offense, the penalty of which is partly a fine and partly a prison sentence, that the penalty may be not less than such a sentence and not more than such a sentence, they say that you must not eliminate the minimum penalty. As a matter of poor draftsmanship it simply means in this farcical legislation that the judge is obliged to give the minimum penalty provided only for such second offense and not in the gradation provided in the present law. So he may, inconsistently, give more for a first offense than he could give legitimately for a second offense, because they provide that the minimum penalty only under the law shall not be eliminated.

Now I am in sympathy with the object of this bill. The object is to get after the commercial fellow, the big bootlegger. I am in hearty sympathy with that purpose. If legislation should be provided so as to reach that particular type of offender most of the Members of this House, I am sure, would be glad to vote for it. But this legislation is not going to accomplish the object it seeks to accomplish. In the first place, you are increasing the maximum penalty in first offenses to such an extent that you will have difficulty in getting convictions under this act. I have been a prosecuting attorney and have tried many violations of liquor cases, and I tell you in all sincerity that with this increase in the maximum of the penalties for first offenses under this act you will never get the convictions that you must secure in order to obtain adequate law enforcement.

Now, it is a particular bill we are dealing with, not the whole question of prohibition. The bill is carelessly and inartistically drawn. We want to see a good bill, a bill about which we can go home and look our constituents in the face and say, "We have passed a good bill." Do you want to go home and say that you have passed a bill increasing the penalties twentyfold for some trivial first-offense violations under the law? Do you want to go home and say that you have passed a bill making every violation of the liquor law a felony? Do you want to vote for a bill that is so inconsistently drawn that no one, not even the members of the Judiciary Committee of this House understand exactly what it means? [Applause.]

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT].

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Chairman, back before the eighteenth amendment, back before prohibition was a State issue, when the county was the unit, in fact, from my earliest public interest, I have fought for and with drys. During all this time my friends and neighbors know that my private habits were in keeping with my public utterances. I am and have been sincerely hopeful of seeing this issue settled for all time by the freeing of the country from the evils of intoxicating liquors through the honest enforcement of the laws.

I am getting tired of the issue being made a football of politics; tired of politicians who never before advocated or practiced the principles deceiving an unsuspecting public by loud protestations and being elected to office as champions of temperance. In this I make no distinctions—from President of the United States down to constable.

In the recent election many claims were advanced by the friends of the President elect concerning his great executive ability and genius for creating great organizations to do just such work as enforcing prohibition. "He fed Europe and was capable of drying up the United States." Since the election, however, those who made such claims have been, with the approval of the President elect, running from all opportunity to vindicate them. When Doctor Doran, prohibition head, stated that it would require $300,000,000 (less than one-tenth part of the annual expenses of the Government) the friends of the President elect immediately denounced the suggestion and defeated the Senate amendment furnishing the money. Then Mr. BYRNS, of the Appropriations Committee, offered an amendment to provide the President with $24,000,000 to cover what was actually in demand by the Coast Guard and several other enforcement units. This met the same fate from the same source.

Thus far honest-to-God enforcement is still unsought by the leaders of the party in power.

All of us who believe the fundamental principles of the Government as taught by Thomas Jefferson, who have supported the eighteenth amendment and its enforcing acts, must admit that we have at times found ourselves in embarrassing conflicts of thought. Believing the evil to be cured called for drastic treatment, we resolved our doubts in favor of legislation which we believed would be practically effective rather than theoretically sound.

Again we are confronted by this bill with the necessity of approving legislation in several ways more extreme than we would ordinarily employ or be numbered among those who have abandoned the objective for which we have labored so long and which we hold so dear.

The liquor forces, a rebellious set at all times, are responsible, by reason of their organized determination to nullify the will of the majority of the American people. I have reached that point where I believe that any appropriation, however large, and any law, however drastic, that will bring this situation to such a crisis, focussing the attention of temperance people upon the situation, to awaken them from the lethargy which permits placing in power of men and administrations who will pass legislation to satisfy the drys and so enforce it to satisfy the wets, are justifiable. We have reached the situation where the bootleggers and the law breakers are voting with those whose original purpose was to destroy them. In the early days of prohibition activities, the bootleggers voted with the wets; they now vote with the drys, and I for one am not proud of the association.

Mr. Speaker, I support this legislation not because as a legislator I approve all of the principles which it embodies but by reason of the deplorable situation which makes it necessary. [Applause.]

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON].

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the apparent purpose of this bill is to authorize the Federal courts to impose penalties for the violation of the national prohibition act commensurate with the offense. It was my privilege to be a public prosecutor prior to entering Congress. I think I can, therefore, appreciate the force and effect of statements that have been made here that you can not, by merely making penalties severe, secure law observance and prevent its violation. More important than severe penalties is an alert police force fairly certain to detect violations of law, a competent prosecuting officer to speedily prosecute, and a court that will promptly administer an adequate sentence. Fairly certain and prompt detection of crime, with the certainty of immediate prosecution and upon conviction certain and immediate imprisonment, will do more to prevent law violations than mere statutory penalties that appear severe.

I appreciate this. Yet there is an occasion for substantial penalties. The penalty should be sufficient to deter not only the defendant but others from committing a similar offense. There is the possibility of great financial gain in the bootlegging business. Much money is to be made in going into the business on a large scale. There should be some place in the national prohibition act a penalty sufficiently severe to deter those who would like to violate the law.

Mr. Chairman, under section 29 of the act the maximum penalty for manufacturing or selling is a fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment not exceeding six months. Take, for example, the case of a person who is in the business of diverting industrial alcohol from its legitimate use and converting it into alcohol for beverage purposes. The possibility of profits runs into tens of thousands of dollars. What is a $1,000 fine to such a man? What is six months in jail with the possibilities of profits of that amount? Nothing. Under existing law even the second or subsequent offender can not be fined more than $2,000 nor imprisoned for more than five years. This is true no matter how many times he may violate the law and come up for sentence. Therefore it appears to me that if we believe in the enforcement of the laws of the land that we ought to provide penalties commensurate with the offense. [Applause.]

Gentlemen, that is what this bill does. The minimum is left where it is; that is, nothing. The maximum fine is $10,000. The maximum imprisonment is five years, or it may be both fine and imprisonment, depending upon the offense and the offender. All of this is left in the discretion of the court. That is what this bill does.

Furthermore, here is the way I look at the part the Federal Government should take in this question of prohibition enforcement. The Federal Government went into this business because it appeared that that was the only way that the evils of the liquor traffic could be successfully dealt with. There was no intention whatever to relieve the States of responsibility to enforce the law. Therefore, both the States and the Federal Government were given concurrent power. The States, therefore, have the same police power and the same responsibility under the eighteenth amendment that they had before its adoption. It is their business to enforce the law, and especially as to the small violator of law in the various communities and localities. That is essentially a police matter. It can be done by an honest and alert police better than it can be done by Federal officials.

On the other hand, the Federal Government is in the position to better cope with the large and powerful and wholesale violator of the law. If I am correct in this, then the Federal law should provide a penalty for this type of criminal. That is what this bill is designed to do. That is where its merit lies, as I see it.

It has been said here that if this bill becomes a law, Federal prosecuting officers will not be able to proceed by information but that they will have to proceed by indictment. At the present time, it is my understanding that the United States district attorneys can prosecute under section 29 of the national prohibition act through an information instead of awaiting the action of a grand jury. Article V of the Constitution provides that no person shall be held to answer for an infamous crime, except through a presentment or indictment by grand jury. I have not had time to look up the authorities but I am inclined to think that where the maximum penalty is five years that this would be considered an infamous crime and that an indictment would be necessary. However, penalties are prescribed in the national prohibition act not only for illegal manufacture, sale, transportation, importation, or exportation but for possession and other violations of the law not embodied in these words. The small violator of the law, if prosecuted in the Federal court, can be prosecuted on a "possession" count. It is my understanding that it is common practice to-day among the United States district attorneys to charge both possession and sale, and to accept a plea of guilty to the charge of possession for the first offense. There is no reason at all why the use of information for small offenders can not be continued. Notwithstanding the objections that have been made here and after giving this measure a great deal of careful consideration, I am of the opinion that we ought to change this law, and I favor passing the bill as it has been reported out in the committee.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman has had experience as a prosecutor and is an able lawyer. Will the gentleman state that this bill is drawn in a lawyerlike fashion, and that it means anything definite?

Mr. NEWTON. It is not in the language that I would have used if I had been drafting it, but it is in language that can be understood, and which, in my judgment, can not be successfully misinterpreted. If we are going to change this law, we must pass it as it is. This is on account of the parliamentary situation.

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON. Yes.

Mr. BEEDY. I am in sympathy with this law, but I want to ask the gentleman as a lawyer some questions. I have prosecuted a little myself. What does the gentleman think the court would say when it attempts to impose this penalty under the proposed bill of the language:

> That wherever a penalty or penalties are prescribed in a criminal prosecution by the national prohibition act.

Are there ever penalties prescribed in a criminal prosecution? In other words, to make this a law under which you could impose a penalty and keep a man in jail and hold his money, have we not to cut out five words? Ought it not to be—

> Wherever penalty or penalties prescribed by the national prohibition act?

Mr. NEWTON. No; it does not mean that. It means penalties prescribed in the act for a criminal act.

Mr. BEEDY. In a criminal prosecution?

Mr. NEWTON. It means penalties imposed for a criminal act as distinguished from other penalties.

Mr. BEEDY. But it does not say that. It says—> penalties * * * prescribed in a criminal prosecution.

No criminal prosecution prescribes penalties. The language is nonsensical.

Mr. NEWTON. That is what I meant when I answered the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] as I did answer him. But at the same time the fact remains, nevertheless, that while the text is not satisfactory it is apparent what is meant. I do not believe that its meaning can be successfully misinterpreted when construed in connection with the debates in the other body, where that particular phrase was inserted. Furthermore, with reference to the original House bill (H. R. 9588), and the report accompanying it, they clearly show what the meaning is and what was intended. I want to repeat what I have heretofore said, that if I had been drafting this measure myself I certainly would not have used the language that was used.

Mr. BEEDY. I am in sympathy with the bill, but I want it right.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, for the reasons given I favor providing additional penalties to meet arch conspirators and violators of this law, and I hope that this measure will pass.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER].

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am not going to discuss the question of prohibition. Prohibition is with us, it matters not whether we like it. It is a part of the Constitution. We have but one constitutional duty, and that is to enforce the law of the land. I am one of those who believe in enforcing the law. I think no Member of this body will attribute to me the habit of being fanatical. I am not a dry fanatic and I am not a wet fanatic. I hesitated a long time as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary before I voted to bring out the Stalker bill. Because I felt that we should go slowly and accomplish as we proceed, but the time has arrived when the Department of Justice asks us, the Congress, to give it more legislation. They are asking for this particular legislation, and they want this bill passed as it is here suggested, without the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i," even though it seems to me ridiculous so far as some of the language is concerned. That is a funny thing for me to say, perhaps. As a member of the Committee on the Judiciary I have no hesitation in saying that the bill as reported by the committee was a well-worded, concise bill, expressing clearly what was intended. The Jones bill in the Senate and the Stalker bill in the House were identical bills, each being favorably reported. The purpose of each bill was to increase the maximum penalty which the court might in its discretion impose for all criminal violations of Title II of the national prohibition act.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. I regret I can not. The Senate, on the floor of that body, placed some amendments in this bill. The first two of those amendments do not mean anything in my judgment. They do not sound well. They are not vicious. They are perfectly harmless; they are innocuous. Section 2 of the bill was added by the Senate and has a definite purpose. This section was inserted for the purpose of saving minimum penalties provided in existing law, and the first minimum penalty referred to is found in section 29 of Title II of the national prohibition act, and is as follows:

> For a second or subsequent offense [the violator] shall be fined not less than $200 nor more than $2,000 and be imprisoned not less than one month or more than five years.

Under section 2 these minimum penalties will be retained in the law, without section 2 they would be repealed. I say repealed having in mind Revised Statutes, section 13, which is a saving statute, and which in my judgment refers to offenses committed and liabilities incurred before the enactment of the repealing statute.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY] called attention to a particular clause in section 1. There is no question in my mind but that the phrase to which he referred was inserted in the wrong place by the Senate. If the words "in a criminal prosecution" were to be inserted, it seems to me that they should have been inserted after the word "penalties," in line 3, rather than after the word "prescribed" in the same line. I do not approve of the Senate amendment from any standpoint, but it will not destroy the purpose of section 1.

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. No. I have only a minute or two. I want to call attention to some of the objections to the bill raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. STOBBS], a member of the committee, with whom I am usually in accord on legal propositions. He tells us that there would be no uniformity of sentence if this bill becomes a law, indicating that in some jurisdictions one kind of sentence would be imposed, while in other jurisdictions more severe or less severe penalties would be imposed. I presume he adopts the reasoning of the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] who indicated in his remarks that the severity of the sentence would be measured by the judge's feeling toward the prohibition law. We must of necessity leave some discretion in these matters to the courts, and when we reach the stage where we can not trust the discretion of our courts in these matters, then the trouble is in the type of judge, not in the law and not in the system. If the offense against the law is burglary, the court has a discretion as to the severity of the penalty, and this is true in practically all of our criminal statutes, and there is no uniformity as to penalty unless it be a minimum and a maximum, or a definite penalty for all like offenses. Some burglaries are more aggravating than others. In some cases the offender is a hardened criminal; in others he may be a first offender, and I insist that we must not depart from the practice of lodging proper discretion in the sentencing court.

Mr. STOBBS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MICHENER. No; I regret I can not yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman from Massachusetts joins with the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FORT] in arguing that to increase penalties will decrease convictions. That if this bill becomes a law that we will have less convictions and fewer people to sentence to jail for violation of the law. On the other hand, the lady from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON] tells us that "If the provisions of this bill become law, it will cause the United States Government to go into the building business, for we have not now and could not build enough jails to provide the carrying out of the law." Quite evidently Mrs. NORTON feels that there will be more convictions because the bill provides no new minimum penalties but only increases the maximum, and the discretion would still be in the court.

Let us not forget that for first offenses under the present law the offender may be fined not more than $1,000 nor imprisoned not exceeding six months, and no one has pointed out a single case where the court has abused its discretion and sentenced the boy at the football game, of whom the gentleman from Massachusetts has spoken, and who has a flask on his hip, for the maximum penalty. This class of offender will have all the rights which he now has under the law, with the court having an additional right to give commercial violators a sentence that will really mean something. I do not find that anyone has called attention to the probation statute, a very wholesome law now on our statute books, by virtue of which the court may place on probation, without inflicting further penalty, any first-offense violator under the prohibition law. It seems to me that every safeguard is thrown around the casual offender against the prohibition law. This is as it should be, and at the same time teeth should be put into the law so that he who would violate the Constitution and the law for the purpose of making money may be dealt with in such a manner that the punishment inflicted will mean something.

If the parliamentary situation were different, I should be pleased in joining to eliminate all the Senate amendments in section 1 of the act. However, we all realize that in a few hours the Seventieth Congress will end, that an amendment to this act will in effect kill the legislation, and therefore I, for one, am willing to vote for the measure with the harmless Senate amendments. At most these amendments are surplusage. I believe the sentiment of the majority of the people of the country to-day demands that every reasonable effort be made to enforce the prohibition law, and that Congress is expected to vote sufficient funds and to enact proper law to bring about proper enforcement. Those charged with enforcement of the law insist that this measure will aid in enforcement. It can do no harm. It would work no injustice. It is not legislation new in its character, and there would be little opposition at this time if the law pertained to anything other than prohibition. Many of the leading opponents to this bill in this body have, as a rule, opposed all law and appropriations looking toward the enforcement of the law, and the time has arrived when the country is demanding that legislation be enacted to enforce the law rather than to protect the bootlegger.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That wherever a penalty or penalties are prescribed in a criminal prosecution by the national prohibition act, as amended and supplemented, for the illegal manufacture, sale, transportation, importation, or exportation of intoxicating liquor, as defined by section 1, Title II, of the national prohibition act, the penalty imposed for each such offense shall be a fine not to exceed $10,000 or imprisonment not to exceed five years, or both: Provided, That it is the intent of Congress that the court, in imposing sentence hereunder, should discriminate between casual or slight violations and habitual sales of intoxicating liquor, or attempts to commercialize violations of the law.

Mr. TUCKER, Mr. O'CONNOR, Mr. CELLER, and Mr. SABATH rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The member of the committee from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] will be recognized.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I submit an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TUCKER: Beginning in line 9, page 1, after the words "shall be," strike out the remainder of section 1 and insert the following: "After the first offense, for a casual or slight violation of said law, a fine not to exceed $2,000 or imprisonment not to exceed one year, and for any offense for habitual sales or transportation, importation, exportation, or illegal possession, indicating a commercial business, a fine not to exceed $10,000 or imprisonment not to exceed five years, or both."

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer an amendment to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to discuss this bill. I am in favor of providing at this time more effective enforcement of the prohibition laws by increasing the penalties of the law. The purpose of my amendment is to do this very thing. If adopted, it will subject to more severe punishment the bootlegger and others who deliberately and systematically violate the law—selah—and at the same time it will save from that punishment which the Constitution forbids and describes as "cruel and unusual" those who may be charged with what we all recognize and the bill itself recognizes as casual and slight violations. It will make all this certain without trusting the individual judges with varied prejudices to make it certain; and if this amendment is adopted I shall vote for the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Mr. Chairman, I have a high regard for my good friend from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER]; nevertheless, I must oppose this amendment. I am not going to argue the merits of the amendment. I simply want to say this, that it is realized that if this bill is amended in any way, it means the death of the bill. We are wasting our time if we attempt to amend it. We must pass the bill only in its present form. You can not amend it without delaying it in the other body. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota moves that all debate on this amendment be now closed. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 114, noes 103.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers. I am not in favor of wasting time. We have not had adequate time allowed to us.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, the motion has reference only to the pending amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. Tellers are demanded.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw my demand for tellers. I have an amendment to offer to the same section if I am permitted to debate it.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion to close debate on the amendment is agreed to.

All debate is closed on the amendment. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TUCKER), there were—ayes 130, noes 109.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The Chair appointed Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON and Mr. TUCKER as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were 126 ayes and 149 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. O'CONNOR of New York: Page 1, lines 9 and 10, after the word "be" in line 9 strike out the rest of that line and all the words in line 10 and insert in lieu thereof the words "capital punishment."

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not germane.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Chairman, I strike out one form of punishment and substitute another.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard any further?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Dakota desire to be heard?

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. I will reserve the point of order if the gentleman desires.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment for two purposes; first, to demonstrate the temper of the House on this question. I am confident that my amendment to provide for capital punishment, if it would not defeat the bill, would receive at least 300 votes in this House. Such is the spirit and such is the state of mind of full-grown Members of Congress on this subject of prohibition.

I rose principally to answer, probably unnecessarily, certain remarks in the nature of a gratuitous castigation of me by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MOORE], who claimed to be astounded at some remarks of mine in yesterday's RECORD, and more astounded that I did not revise them after having uttered them on the floor, in which I said I was opposed to the eighteenth amendment and detested the Volstead Act. He recalled to me the oath I had taken. In the first instance, I want to dispel a delusion that has permeated this land. A common phrase used throughout this land by Congressmen and by candidates for President is that when a man is elected to this body or to the Presidency he takes an oath to support the Constitution and "the laws of the land." Well, I never took such an oath. I will read you the oath. Nobody seems to recall its contents, although the distinguished Speaker must know them, because he has administered it so often. The Constitution says:

> I do solemnly swear that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion, and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter. So help me God.

Not one word is said about "the laws of the land." That is my first point, so forever dispel that delusion from your minds.

When I swore to "support" the Constitution of the United States I did not swear to get down on my knees and worship it. I did not forever foreclose my opinion as to how I felt toward any one or more articles or amendments. Why, if you carried that argument to a logical conclusion, any time a man introduced an amendment to the Constitution he would not be "supporting" it. Under the theory of the fanatical "drys" he must love every article; he must love every amendment as a part of the decalogue. Yet, I know countless men in this body who hate and despite many of the amendments. I reserve the right, gentlemen, to challenge any amendment to the Constitution; I did not swear to "support" it as a fetish. It is ridiculous, and it is puerile to suggest that a Member can not disagree with an amendment. I do not have to worship the laws of my land, and I do not have to bow the knee at the throne upon which they are enshrined. I can move to repeal them and to amend them. I can criticize them.

Now, what is all this hullabaloo about? Who is "supporting" the Constitution of the United States? I maintain I am in the interests of millions of our people. Are you "drys" supporting the Constitution or are you bowing your knees in submission to the organizations which place themselves above the Constitution of the United States. Are you pledging your "full faith and allegiance" to the Constitution or are you catering to the Anti-Saloon League, whose leader and whose dictator sits there in the corner of the gallery watching your every move, sending messages down here to somewhere, I do not know. There he sits, Doctor McBride, the "superpresident" of the United States, shaking his black mane in approval or disapproval. Many of you are well aware he is there. His organization is the "constitution"; that is the "amendment" you drys hold in such reverence—not the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I have risen in opposition to the amendment, and I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio has been recognized, and he can not be taken off his feet.

Mr. MOORE of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, talk about ridiculous amendments. This is surely the height of ridiculousness when the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] offers an amendment providing the death penalty. It just shows how earnest the gentleman is in the interest of law enforcement. I am glad the gentleman read the oath that we take. I wish he had read section 2 of the eighteenth amendment, which provides that—> the Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

I look upon this, as other men do, that it became my duty to pass an enforcement statute.

The gentleman says, and I give his language again that it may not be forgotten, and I am surprised he did not apologize for it—

> I am against the eighteenth amendment.

And yet that amendment is in the Constitution and just as much the Constitution as any other part of it.

Then he says:

> I abhor it. I despise it.

I contend this is not proper respect for the Constitution of the United States. [Applause.]

And he further says:

> I would not counsel anybody to even respect the law.

And yet the gentleman is a lawmaker. I believe in being law observers, too. The gentleman is unwilling to counsel anybody to respect a law that has been enacted and passed the House and the Senate of the United States.

So I make no apology. I make this argument sincerely. Not because of the personality of the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR], do I attack his position, but because it is untenable and because I believe he strikes at the very foundation of government itself. I concede the right to change the Constitution and the laws in the proper way but not to nullify them while they are in existence.

The gentleman referred to organizations. I do not know to which one he responds, but I may surmise. There are men here who believe in a sober nation and who believe in good, clean government, and I contend the attitude of the gentleman, as expressed in his speech the other day, is inimical to the best interests of the Government, law observance, and law enforcement. [Applause.]

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this amendment do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Chicago [laughter] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment by Mr. SABATH: After the word "exceed," in line 10, strike out the word "five" and insert the word "one."

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, inasmuch as my good friend the Chairman recognized me as "the gentleman from Chicago," instead of in the usual manner, "the gentleman from Illinois," and since my subject is to be the Volstead Act, I take it that the Chairman and some of my other friends in the House evidently think there is something queer with Chicago so far as the subject of prohibition is concerned.

But, gentlemen, notwithstanding what you have been reading in the newspapers of late about our city, I am still proud of the fact that I am a citizen of the great city of Chicago. The fact is that during the last few years we have had a Republican mayor and a Republican administration at the helm in Chicago, and I must admit that a number of things of which we Chicagoans are not any more proud than you, have, due to prohibition, taken place. [Laughter and applause.]

I repeat that I am still proud of Chicago, however, because the great rank and file of the citizens of Chicago are just as peaceful and law-abiding, just as careful of their conduct and jealous of the reputation of their city, as are the citizens of any other community in the United States. The adverse publicity that the city of Chicago has been receiving of late is not due in the slightest degree to the average man or woman of my city, but to rival cliques of prohibition-made gangsters.

And I desire to be understood as charging here on this floor now that it is the prohibitionists and their allied forces and coworkers, the Ku-Klux Klan fanatics, that are responsible for the existence of the gunman and the racketeer in Chicago. The bootlegging and the gang killings of my city and of other cities in the United States are not the by-product, but the direct product of the Volstead Act, and the supporters of this crime breeding legislation must claim this new cult of American criminals entirely as their own, and take the responsibility for their existence.

But it was the combination of prohibitionists and Ku-Klux Klan that brought about the defeat of Mayor William Dever, one of the cleanest mayors the city of Chicago ever had, because forsooth, he was not of their religious faith, and because he was a Democrat. The advocates of the Volstead law and the Ku-Klux Klan gave their support to bring about the election of the Republican mayor under whose misrule the gang murders you have been reading about have taken place in Chicago. But notwithstanding the fact that I am not here to defend the administration of Chicago's present mayor, I desire to state it as my opinion that even if he had tried his utmost to enforce the prohibition law he could not have done so.

BOOTLEGGERS, HIJACKERS, AND GUNMEN UNDERMINING CITY, STATE, AND NATIONAL GOVERNMENTS

This law has brought into existence a combination of forces of the underworld that is so powerful and resourceful as to be able to successfully defy control. So great has grown this evil machine of bribery and corruption that it has become a menace not only to city and State governments, but to the National Government as well.

This Congress that is now on the verge of adjournment has appropriated, directly and indirectly, around $60,000,000 for dry-law enforcement in the United States for the next fiscal year, yet we know now and in advance that there will be and can be no real enforcement; that the law will be violated every minute of the hour, every hour of the day, and every day of the coming year during which this huge sum is to be expended. We know, and if we want to be absolutely honest, we must admit that it will be violated within the very shadow of the Capitol Building in which we sit to-day, if indeed, not in this very building itself; it will be violated not only in every block in the city of Washington, but in every block in every large city of the land; in the towns and hamlets and cross-roads, out on the prairies and deep in the forests; wherever in this broad land humanity dwells. But the governments of neither the towns nor the cities nor the Nation will receive a penny of tax on this enormous liquor consumption.

The profits of this stupendous traffic in illegal and often poisonous liquor, profits amounting to a greater sum over the entire country than those of many foremost industries of the Nation, will go in their entirety to this organized machine of underworld gangsters, some of it to find its way into the pockets of public officials who will consent to be bribed, and the remainder to give still further power to the racketeer, the hijacker, and the killer. All this, unless we are too dumb to occupy a position of public trust, we know, and yet we must sit here helpless and watch this prohibition-where-there-is-no-prohibition farce continue.

NO MORE LAW VIOLATIONS IN CHICAGO THAN IN ANY OTHER LARGE AMERICAN CITY

I admit that we have a certain amount of crime in Chicago, but where is the community or the city that has not? Investigation will show there is no more crime in Chicago in proportion to its enormous population than in any other city or section of the United States. Later in these remarks I will, in fact, present to Congress official figures of the United States Government showing there is actually less law violation per capita in Chicago and the State of Illinois than in the Southern States that have sent the leading and most obnoxious "dry" advocates to Congress.

But while I have the opportunity I want to emphasize with all the vigor that I can command that the city of Chicago is as good a city as any in the United States, and that citizens and visitors there are as safe as in any place in this country. I challenge the strongest and most vicious enemy of Chicago to point out a single instance in the last five or six years where an out-of-town visitor there has been molested in any way or interfered with. Fortunately, these gangsters that you read about have the happy custom of confining their killings within their own ranks, and to their own kind.

If, instead of passing this bill to increase the penalties for violation of the prohibition law, you will take my advice and amend the Volstead law in a sane and moderate way, I can assure you that law and order will prevail in Chicago to a greater extent than in perhaps any other city, because the vast majority of our people are law-abiding, but they feel that the prohibition law is unjustifiable and should be repealed or at least amended.

CONGRESS CARRIES OUT THE ORDERS OF PROHIBITION LEADERS WHO SIT IN THE GALLERIES AND ISSUE ORDERS

The gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] pointed out a gentleman in the gallery who is giving this House its orders. Well, he is not the only one. There are others. The Anti-Saloon League is now working in conjunction with the secret organization known as the Ku-Klux Klan, with such leaders and bishops as Cannon and Wilson, with the aid of Mr. McBride and other fanatics.

Well, I know what the result will be with respect to my amendment. I know it will not succeed. The word has been given you and you must vote, but I do want to congratulate the 126 Members who only a few moments ago, voted for practically the same amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

A Member of the House, a few moments ago, attacked the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] because he has courage to advocate an amendment of the Volstead Act or the eighteenth amendment. Nullifiers? You, the prohibitionists, are the nullifiers and not we, who advocate the amendment of the Volstead Act or the eighteenth amendment.

When you advocated the eighteenth amendment, were you dissatisfied with the Constitution?

You were then opposed to the Constitution of the United States. You wanted to have it changed, and you changed it by the adoption of the eighteenth amendment. I want you to read Article IV in the Constitution, Article V, Article VI, Article VIII, and Article XIV, and by reading them you will be obliged to admit that you are the nullifiers of the Constitution, and not we who advocate in a proper way, in a legal way, the amending of the Volstead Act. Therefore I think it is manifestly unjustifiable on your part, you who have violated the Constitution, when you forced in a legal way the eighteenth amendment into the Constitution, to now accuse us of being the nullifiers!

If gentlemen who are giving you orders, like Bishop Cannon, and his assistants, would give a little more time to the church instead of to politics, I think they would be doing the country a great deal more good. It seems to me that instead of serving God first they seem to be in favor of the devil, and allowing the church and the people go to the devil instead of serving God. [Applause.]

BILL IS THE MOST CRUEL EVER PRESENTED TO A CONGRESS

Mr. Chairman, I can not support this bill. It is entirely too drastic. It is indefensible. After studying its provisions I am firmly convinced that it is contrary to the letter and the spirit of the Constitution of the United States, which sets out that—excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

This bill makes it an offense for a man driving along the public highway with a half pint of liquor on his person for his own personal use, and not for sale, punishable by five years in the penitentiary and a fine of $10,000. A farmer who drives to town with a gallon of cider for a friend might be sent to the penitentiary for five years and made to pay a fine of $10,000. A man or a woman may be made to pay the same penalty if found guilty of making a pint of home brew for their own use. Five years in prison and a $10,000 fine for an offender of the prohibition law, no matter what might be the circumstances in the individual case! It is possible under this bill, and it is cruel! I for one will not be a party to it. Such a law could possibly place a trivial offender in the same category with the murderer, the rapist, or a man who robs a train or burglarizes a bank. God pity the son or the daughter of any Member of this body or of any citizen of our land who may run afoul of this barbaric law. It would ruin the entire life of such an unfortunate lad or girl. I would not wish such a law on even my worst enemy.

I know that the proponents of this bill which is soon to become a law will answer that it is so worded that it is left to the discretion of the Federal judges to determine the degree of punishment to be meted out to the offender, and that the minimum penalties still remain in the bill. But we all know there are judges and judges, and I for one am not willing to write into the statutes the power for any judge to inflict such a penalty for a minor law infraction as will become possible under this bill.

TO SEND YOUNG MEN AND WOMEN TO PRISON IS OFTEN TO SEND THEM TO HELL

I wonder whether the average Member of Congress who is supporting this legislation has ever stopped to contemplate what it means to send a young man to prison. I can not believe so, else he would ponder well before he cast an affirmative vote.

Let me present the picture here as United States Senator REED of Missouri presented it to the Senate:

In two short years 125,000 to 130,000 have been jailed (for violation of these prohibition laws), an army as great as has conquered kingdoms; a mighty host of human beings, with hearts that beat, with nerves that feel, with souls to be exalted or destroyed. Into prison cells in contact with vice, with every form of horrid crime, these men were thrust, and thereby you think you serve the good and merciful God.

Turn your eyes to that picture and answer whether a law that does a thing like that to men who have only responded to an appetite, ingrained in man from the first, is not what I denounce it to be, a crime within itself.

Look again at the picture. Poor boys and impoverished mothers are sentenced to hard labor until death shall break their prison bars. And for what, pray? Because on the testimony of a sneak and informer they were convicted of having for the second or third time been caught with a little liquor in their possession, or of selling a drink to somebody who desired to buy it. Look closely at the picture. It is a shifting panorama—a tragedy running through the years—the victims are dressed in ignominious stripes. They hear the click of the lock that shuts them in forever. They are thrust into foul cells. They are forced into the parade of the lock step. They eat loathsome prison food. They speak in whispers. They are slaves toiling beneath the muzzle of rifles at hard and unrequited tasks. They are compelled to associate with the vilest of criminals. The light of hope has faded from their eyes. Despair has settled upon their souls and left its shadow upon their faces. They long for the fresh fields. Their nostrils beg for the breath of flowers. Their hearts ache for the loved ones left at home. And these victims, sirs, in the great majority of cases are not bad people. There lie within prison walls many boys who heroically sprang from the trenches and bravely faced the fire of the machine guns in France. There lie rotting within those cells many men who were useful citizens and who beyond all doubt were never guilty of a real crime.

Look once more! One hundred and thirty thousand human beings in prison stripes are marching in the lock step. The procession extends for miles. It winds in and out like the folds of a gigantic striped serpent. Leering at it from the side lines are the hard eyes of Bishop Cannon. Truly, the dream of Wayne B. Wheeler is realized. He has made "them believe in hell." And, merciful God, this occurs beneath the American flag. But still the fanatics demand punishment and yet more punishment. The cry is that of the degenerate Roman of Rome's degenerate days, "A man for the tiger and a man for the lion this morning, O good Quirites!" To this sad estate has the Congress of the United States and the American Government come.

BILL WILL INCREASE POSSIBILITY OF BRIBERY AND CORRUPTION

I firmly believe the enactment of this increased fine and imprisonment will be followed by more bribery of police, State and Federal prosecuting and district attorneys, prohibition officers, jurors, and courts than ever. While the poor man, the individual without political influence or wealth, will fall its victim, the wealthy man, and especially the rich bootlegger, will most often escape.

The price of illegal liquor will probably advance, meaning greater profits to the men engaged in the various branches of the bootlegging industry, and they in turn will have still greater sums to spend for bribery and corruption, and greater reason than heretofore for seeking to bribe and buy their way out of tight places. The big racketeers, who already have one or more convictions to their credit, may not be as willing to risk the actual personal transportation of liquor as heretofore, but they will have no difficulty in hiring plenty of men who have no convictions standing against them to run the blockade in their stead.

With the penalty so severe as provided in this bill, there will be more demands for jury trials than ever before, and the courts, already clogged with liquor-violation cases, will become so loaded down with prohibition-enforcement matters as to seriously slow up justice everywhere.

The severity of punishment in this bill is certain, too, to make conviction even less frequent than heretofore. It is going to be difficult to find 12 men who will agree on a conviction, knowing how harsh a penalty the court may impose.

And in the case of a defendant who has grown rich in the liquor business under prohibition, no one of the 12 jurors sitting on his case will be safe from approach by bribers and blackmailers.

GREATER PER CAPITA VOLSTEAD LAW VIOLATION IN "DRY" SOUTH THAN IN ILLINOIS, INCLUDING CHICAGO

It is a curious fact that the increase of arrests for drunkenness appears markedly greater in the former so-called dry States than in the former so-called wet States.

Another peculiar fact revealed by the official report of the Commissioner of Prohibition is that some of the States which send the leading dry crusaders to Congress are greater violators of the prohibition law, in proportion to population, than some of the former so-called wet States. Much is said, for instance, about the "wetness" of my own State, Illinois. Now, I frankly admit the prohibition law is violated there, but you seldom hear the representatives of the "dry" States doing likewise. Yet the official report of the United States Commissioner of Prohibition shows that the number of arrests for violations of the prohibition amendment is greater per capita in the "dry" South, which produces our leading "dry" advocates, than in "wet" Illinois. The following figures are all taken from the report indicated, covering the year ending June 30, 1928:

State	Population estimated, 1925	Distilleries seized	Stills seized	Still worms seized	Fermenters seized	Spirits seized	Mash seized
						Gallons	Gallons
Alabama	2,467,190	414	308	3	4,298	8,207	377,634
Florida	1,253,957	820	581	850	20,981	36,596	1,097,287
Georgia	3,058,260	1,919	1,484	934	19,379	33,351	2,456,067
Total	6,779,407	3,153	2,373,	1,787	44,658	78,154	3,930,988
Illinois	6,964,950	330	935	191	91,431	75,193	1,618,234

This table and figures show that there were ten times as many distilleries, three times as many stills, nine times as many still worms, five times as many fermenters, and over twice the number of gallons of mash seized in the three States with a population of 200,000 less than that of the State of Illinois. And this notwithstanding that the laws are not enforced in these dry States to the exent that they are in my State.

PROHIBITION IS NOT BEING, AND CAN NOT BE, ENFORCED

Regardless of anything the advocates of prohibition may say, they can not successfully deny that the number of arrests for drunkenness is steadily increasing throughout the United States. No matter how large the appropriations for enforcement may be, no matter how severe the penalities may be, prohibition can not be enforced. Congress might, with as much prospect of successful enforcement, enact a law prohibiting man from mating with woman. It could be enforced just as easily, but no easier nor more successfully, than can prohibition, which means, in a few words, that it could not be enforced at all. Man was born in the world with certain natural instincts, and to the extent they are interferred with, even by law, he becomes to that same extent a slave, and by methods as sly and cunning as those of the slave, he may be depended upon to show his resentment of the barriers that he feels have been unjustly raised against his freedom.

The reason prohibition can not be enforced is that there are too many millions of Americans who do not believe in the justice of the law. It has been proven throughout the ages that the only law man will respect is a law that he, himself, recognizes to be based on common sense and justice. There are, for instance, millions of men and women who would not think of stealing a five cent piece, but who would not have the slightest hesitancy about accepting and drinking a cooling and refreshing glass of beer on a hot summer day even though it were a violation of a hundred laws. Now, why do men and women respect the law in one instance, and yet violate the other without the slightest quibble of conscience?

The answer to this paradoxical dilemma with which the United States is now confronted is that the wee, small voice within man which tells him what is sin and what is not sin, lets him know that it is morally wrong to steal. But he seems to receive no such dictate from his conscience when it comes to the matter of having his harmless glass of beer. He may drink it, and enjoy it, and forget it. His conscience does not seem to trouble him. Much less does he consider himself a criminal, like he would had he robbed some one. No doubt he feels within him that if on judgment day the worst thing recorded on the big book against his name is that he enjoyed his glass of beer, his chances of entering the pearly gates will be no whit less than those of the men who would have had him drawn and quartered for his exercise of this mere innocent personal pleasure, but who themselves went through life without either understanding or forgiveness for their fellow men. So the average man will indulge his beer, and he will lie down to sleep, untroubled. And the power does not exist that can convince that man that he is a criminal.

And, to my way of thinking, we may pass laws here until we are black in the face, and we may appropriate as many millions as we please to enforce them, but the masses will not respect them or obey them if they believe they are based on the other fellow's personal prejudice and not founded in justice and common sense. And in reaching a conclusion on these subjects it will be they, and not us, who will do the deciding as to whether they are based on prejudice or not.

WASHINGTON, D. C., AS A SAMPLE OF PROHIBITION ENFORCEMENT

The most practical proof of the fact that real enforcement of the prohibition law is impossible is that it never has been enforced anywhere, and it is not being enforced now. President Harding could not, or did not enforce it; Coolidge could not, or did not enforce it, and Herbert Hoover can not enforce it. He may be able to accomplish great engineering feats, but neither he nor any other man who may become President after him, not even a prohibitionist President, can change human nature.

It it were possible to enforce the Volstead law anywhere in the United States, that place logically might be expected to be right here in the city of Washington, D. C. For it is here that the Congress of the United States is located, it is here that the President of the United States resides, and what ought to be more to the point still, it is here that the chief prohibition offices of the Government are located. If there is any one little spot in the country, I repeat, where the Government ought to make a showing, it is here within the shadows of the great buildings wherein are housed the prohibition enforcement machinery which is maintained at a cost of millions of dollars annually of the taxpayers' money.

Let us, then, examine the situation here in the Capital of the United States with regard to prohibition enforcement, or, more accurately speaking, nonenforcement. It was only a few days ago that Maj. Edwin B. Hesse, superintendent of police of the District of Columbia, submitted his report for the year 1928, so that in this instance we have available information that is almost right up to the minute.

Major Hesse, in spite of the fact that the admission might seem a reflection upon the efficiency of his own department, makes public a report which shows that the number of arrests for drunkenness in Washington during 1928 broke all records. In the 12-month period the Washington police took in custody 13,706 alleged "drunks." This was 174 per cent more than were arrested here for the same cause in 1911, when the town was supposed to be "wide open."

In 1911, when there was a saloon on almost every corner, the police here arrested only 4,988 persons for intoxication. Since then, under "prohibition," the number has been steadily increasing.

The fact that 13,706 arrests were made for drunkenness in Washington last year does not by any means imply that only that number of citizens were intoxicated in this fountainhead "prohibition" city of Washington. There were very likely many, many times that number intoxicated who were not arrested. For the average policeman here and elsewhere would rather not arrest an intoxicated man than arrest him, and, as a matter of fact, only does make an arrest for such offense when actually required to do so by reason of the fact that a person under the influence of stimulants becomes so disorderly as to attract general attention. The average policeman is not in sympathy with prohibition because, in the first place, he knows it is a farce and, because, in the second place, no one enjoys a sociable drink under proper circumstances—for instance, a hot toddy on a bitter-cold night at the hands of some sympathizing friend who can be duly trusted—more than does Mr. Average Policeman himself.

But it must appear evident to the merest school boy that if 13,706 persons in Washington in the single year 1928 were able to obtain sufficient liquor to become so disorderly as to require their arrest, that there must have necessarily existed plenty of places in America's Capital City where that supposedly nonexistent commodity was in fact easily available. And that is the right answer.

For, as a matter of fact, the bootlegger and the "speak-easy" flourish in Washington much as in every other large American city, and this in spite of the presence here of Congress, the President, the heads of the law-enforcement officials, and, yes, with the utmost contempt for even the heads of the Anti-Saloon League, who sit in the galleries of the House of Representatives and the Senate telling those bodies what to do and what not to do.

It is estimated that to-day there are no less than 5,000 "speak-easies" open and operating in Washington, and if they could everyone be raided and closed to-night there would be as many more replacing them before the end of a week.

Yet in spite of the fact that prohibition has unloosed upon the country a horde of dangerous, lawless characters who are growing rich in the sale of illicit liquor, and in spite of the fact that prohibition does not make for temperance but for intemperance, and in spite of the fact that all admit the Volstead Act is being violated everywhere with impunity, yet our prohibitionist friends blandly tell us there shall be no amendment or relief though the heavens fall. And for the time being, I regret to say, this seems to be the fact. For, as one of our leading college professors recently wittily remarked:

The United States seems to be determined to have its prohibition and its liquor, too.

And he might have accurately added:

And its poisonous liquor, and its accompanying ever-increasing reign of lawlessness and public corruption, even to the very point of the destruction of the Government itself, along with its prohibition!

In fairness to the then President Coolidge I desire to make it plain that I am not intending to insinuate that he allowed the army of bootleggers to ply their trade during his administration almost under his very nose with his approval or consent. Even had he wished to do so, he could not have stopped the violation of the Volstead Act, for the simple reason that the people are not at heart in sympathy with the strict enforcement of the law. Too many of them, as the professor said, "insist upon their prohibition, and their liquor, too."

The real point that I desire to drive home in relation to Washington is that if the men in charge of the movement to make the country dry can not succeed even in the comparatively small territory through which they pass every day to and from their offices, and in which they live, how can they succeed or be expected to succeed in the cities and States far removed from their headquarters and personal influence? Again, the question answers itself: They can not.

LIQUOR IS SOLD IN WASHINGTON AS SUGAR IS SOLD IN GROCERIES

For the benefit of those who may think I am prejudiced in my picture of Volstead law violations in Washington, I will submit some evidence from the prohibition advocates themselves. The National United Committee for Law Enforcement on February 18, 1929—very recent testimony indeed—issued a statement depicting conditions here even worse than I have painted them. One heading is—

THE TRUTH ABOUT WASHINGTON

The Capital City is seething in lawlessness and saturated with poison liquor, dispensed by bootleggers under various aliases, operating openly and sold in hundreds of places as sugar is sold in groceries.

One does not need a card of introduction or speak the shibboleth of the underworld to obtain admission or accommodation; all that is required is a thirst and the price. Anybody's money is good for rotten rum in Death Valleys.

Washington is a Sodom of Suds, sold openly behind false fronts and fictitious names, containing from 4 to 60 per cent of alcoholic poison and in some cases so labeled.

We make no loose charges. We are not hiding behind "estimates" previously made, or charges now headlining the press, or being uncorked in fluid eloquence on the floors of Congress, but after personal investigation by trained operatives.

* * * * * * *

Hundreds of such places, scattered all over the city, and in some cases in solid blocks, and not far removed from the Capitol itself, are found to be operating in violation of the law.

DEATH VALLEYS IN WASHINGTON

For the past month the united committee has been making an undercover investigation into conditions in this Capital City. For this work we brought experienced and trained men from outside the city, and unknown in Washington. They report to us the places visited, the hour, the date, observations, character of premises, and purchases seen and made.

The places include hotels, back-room bars, restaurants, lunch rooms, barber shops, tailor shops, cigar, delicatessen, and candy stores, and private houses with "rooms to let."

SPECIMEN REPORTS

No. 247. Entered; E Street NW.; cigar store; 12.15 p. m.; purchased five drinks of gin, 25 cents per drink; sold in back room with sign "No admittance" on door. Time, 20 minutes.

Then there is given a list of places visited and dates, following which the statement continues:

Here are 342 places in which the law is flagrantly and openly violated and in which wine, gin, red liquor, corn, or whisky was being sold, and purchased by the drink and bottle. In addition, there are numerous places all over the city where bottled "bay rum" is sold to all comers, containing 60 per cent of alcohol.

BOOTLEGGING ONE OF THE BIGGEST INDUSTRIES OF DETROIT

Passing from Washington, let us take a peep at conditions in Detroit, one of the largest cities in a State which sends one of the leading prohibitionists to Congress. I quote from an article in the Buffalo Courier-Express, which is headed:

SO THIS IS VOLSTEADISM

As an indication of the need of definite information from presidential candidates to what they mean when they pledge themselves to prohibition enforcement, Detroit's bootlegging industry may be cited. Doubtless, comparable figures could be obtained in any city situated as Detroit is, in a border or coast district, where rum runners ply their trade.

Detroit's liquor business, including smuggling, manufacturing, and distribution, is estimated to employ 50,000 persons, with an output valued at $215,000,000. It is second, according to a story printed yesterday morning in this newspaper, only to the automobile industry. The chemical industry is a big business in Detroit, but it is a "poor third" when compared with the bootlegging trade. Its annual production is valued at only $87,000,000, or considerably less than one-half of the estimated value of the illicit liquor business.

In referring to Michigan I wish to take advantage of this opportunity of thanking and congratulating the members of the Michigan House of Representatives for having, according to newspaper reports, voted to repeal that provision of its barbarous State law under which the mother of six children and a mere boy have been sent to prison for life as fourth offenders for violating the liquor law.

POISON LIQUOR BEING SOLD UNDER VOLSTEADISM

Statistics show a startling increase in the death rate from alcoholism and from cirrhosis of the liver, a disease attributed to alcohol. Not only do they indicate the constantly increasing use of liquor under the Volstead Act but they indicate an increasing use of poisoned liquor. The figures obtained from the United States Bureau of the Census show that in virtually every State, whether called "wet" or "dry," the death rate has been mounting, and that the highest rate in the United States was in the State of Wyoming, which has consistently voted "dry." This State was not in the reporting area when the law went into effect in 1920, but between 1922 and 1926, inclusive, its death rate from these causes had risen nearly 200 per cent and now stands at 8.9 per 100,000.

Between 1914 and the taking effect of the Volstead Act, January 17, 1920, there had been a steady decrease in the number of deaths from alcoholism until the rate then stood at 1 per 100,000. By 1926 it had risen to 3.9 per 100,000, or practically four times greater. In 1920 the rate of deaths from cirrhosis of the liver was 6.2; in the figures for 1926 it was 7.5.

Says Senator REED of Missouri:

There was a Republican convention held in Kansas City. Some of the leading "political prohibitionists" were paying the bell boys $7, $8, $9, and $10 a pint for a class of whisky that no respectable Missourian would ever think of drinking.

It is a serious count in the indictment against the Volstead Act when 11,000 or 12,000 persons die from poisonous liquor in one year.

PUBLIC OFFICIALS WHO VOTE DRY AND DRINK WET

That many, many men in public life "vote dry and drink wet" is well known. Senator JAMES REED of Missouri, in his great speech in the Senate on February 16, 1929, referring to this subject, said:

The day will soon be here when the men who vote for prohibition that they may gain or retain office and who themselves violate the letter and the spirit of the law will be held in that contempt which justice demands should be visited upon all knavish hypocrites who wear the mask of pretended virtue The day will soon come when judges who by brutal penalties have made malefactors of decent boys and men will sink into that obloquy which is the just reward of cruelty, oppression, and wrong.

Mr. President, I saw the original prohibitory law voted. I saw the veto of President Wilson incontinently overruled. I heard the affirmative vote of man after man who had drunk liquor all his life and who intended to keep on drinking. Time and time again I have seen prohibition bills came before Congress. I have heard roll call after roll call paralleling the one I have just described. Sir, the man who will vote to send his fellow man to jail for selling a drink of whisky and who will buy one himself is a coward—a canting and contemptible coward. I do not apply those terms to men who observe the doctrines they would force on others, but I hold in an abhorrence and contempt that can not be described in any tongue man has ever spoken the creature who to keep his place in the Senate or House of Representatives votes to make a felon of others for doing that which he himself connives at and practices.

SOME INTIMATE PERSONAL HISTORY OF THE BIGOTS WHO FORCED PROHIBITION ON THE UNITED STATES

It may be interesting right here to inquire into the personalities of a couple of the men who forced the crime-breeding prohibition upon the United States. One of these was the late Wayne B. Wheeler, head of the Anti-Saloon League that raised and spent, no one will ever know how much on themselves, some $35,000,000 to "sell" prohibition to the American people. The following are a few excerpts from an article by Justin Steuart, who was formerly publicity secretary to Mr. Wheeler:

Wayne B. Wheeler controlled six Congresses, dictated to two Presidents of the United States, directed legislation in most of the States of the Union, picked the candidates for the more important elective State and Federal offices, held the balance of power in both Republican and Democratic Parties, distributed more patronage than any dozen other men, supervised a Federal bureau from outside without official authority—

We know that bureau was the Prohibition Bureau of the United States Government.

Where Wheeler sat was always the head of the table. He had an instinct for preeminence. A tireless opportunist, he dramatized himself as the champion of prohibition until the general public pictured him as a mighty St. George fighting single-handed against a swarm of dragons.

* * * * * * *

He loved the limelight. Attacks pleased him nearly as much as praise. * * * He urged the need of loyalty upon others, but frequently disregarded the orders of superior officers and ignored resolutions passed by the boards of the Anti-Saloon League, which were responsible for its political or legislative policy. He waited until boards or committees had adjourned and their members returned to widely separated parts of the Nation, and then forgot them.

* * * * * * *

He loved power. If power could not be won, he loved the semblance of power. He never attacked the administration. Such attack might be construed as evidence that he lacked influence with the administration. His favorite text was: "The powers that be are ordained of God." This did not prevent his own insubordination. Because of the influence over the policy of the Prohibition Department that would be his under the Haynes régime, he supported Roy A. Haynes for Commissioner of Prohibition under the reorganization bill in the face of the objections of many of the sanest men in the league. By a political maneuver he prevented the election of the ablest man in the league to its national superintendency while he persuaded or dragooned delegates to support his own candidate.

* * * * * * *

He was the exponent of force. From his first days as superintendent of a district in Ohio, when he assailed the courts for leniency, to the end of his life he preferred threats to persuasion. * * * He desired the most severe penalties, the most aggressive policies, even to calling out the Army and Navy, the most relentless prosecution. A favorite phrase was: "We'll make them believe in punishment after death."

"PUSSYFOOT" JOHNSON HAD NO SCRUPLES AGAINST LYING AND BRIBERY TO ACHIEVE HIS ENDS

Another leading prohibition champion is "Pussyfoot" Johnson. As to this gentleman, we do not have to accept any second-handed information about him, for we take the following from his own testimony before a Senate committee. He was regularly on the pay roll of the Anti-Saloon League from 1917 to 1922:

Did I ever kill anybody? It has been often said that I did. Stories of slaughter have been repeated and printed. I let them pass, for in the wild days they served a useful purpose.

It served a useful purpose to have people think he was a killer engaged in a great moral movement!

They helped spread terror among the lawless, and that aided my work.

* * * * * * *

Did I ever lie to promote prohibition? Decidedly, yes. I have told enough lies for the cause to make Ananias ashamed of himself.

* * * * * * *

Did I ever bribe anybody? Yes. In 1913 I bribed some Russian officials to give me a lot of secret information concerning Section X of their Government administration. I bribed Eurasian railway officials all over India, because that is the accepted way of getting favors in that country. In my law-enforcement work for the Government I bribed many bad men to give me information about their associates.

That is the man who helped fix the moral standards of the people of the United States.

PRESIDENT WILSON CALLED "DRYS" "MISERABLE HYPOCRITES"

Were the late President Wilson in the White House to-day we know what he would do to the legislation now under consideration here. He would veto it. In this connection, there recently came to light information as to his reaction to the action of Congress in overriding his veto of the national prohibition amendment. His exact words on the subject were revealed by Dr. Hugh Young, of the Johns Hopkins Hospital of Baltimore, and published in newspapers throughout the United States on January 16 and 17.

Doctor Young was moved to break a silence of more than nine years by the reading of an editorial, Setting the Record, which appeared in the Baltimore Sun.

The editorial concerned the record by Ray Stannard Baker of Wilson's declaration of his belief in the advisability of the settlement of the liquor issue by local option in each community.

The war over, it was brought out that the President believed the prohibition of liquor, as enforced by the war-time prohibition act to conserve grain, was unnecessary.

At the time President Wilson expressed himself on these questions, in 1919, he was ill and was being attended by Doctor Young. As Doctor Young was conversing with the sick President, a messenger arrived at the room with the report of what the congressional body had done. The President grew very much incensed.

These miserable hypocrites, in the House and Senate—voting to override my veto of the bill, many with their cellars stocked with liquors and not believing in prohibition at all—jumping at the whip of the lobbyists.

The bill is utterly unnecessary. It was passed during the war for the purpose of saving grain. The need has gone by. The country would be better off with light wines and beers.

I was tremendously impressed in Europe with what General Pershing had done to decrease drunkenness and disease by putting the American Army on a light wine and beer basis, through General Order No. 77. The war is over and there is no need for this bill.

PRESIDENT WILSON FAVORED LIGHT WINES AND BEER

In vetoing the Volstead Act, in his message to Congress of October 27, 1919, President Wilson, in part, stated:

To the House of Representatives:

I am returning without my signature H. R. 6810, "An act to prohibit intoxicating beverages, and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes.

* * * * * * *

I object to and can not approve that part of this legislation with reference to war-time prohibition. It has to do with the enforcement of an act which was passed by reason of the emergencies of the war and whose objects have been satisfied in the demobilization of the Army and Navy, and whose repeal I have already sought at the hands of Congress. Where the purposes of particular legislation arising out of war emergency have been satisfied, sound public policy makes clear the reason and necessity for repeal.

In all matters having to do with the personal habits and customs of large numbers of our people we must be certain that the established processes of legal change are followed.

* * * * * * *

WOODROW WILSON.

President Wilson, according to a United States Senator, who was a close political and personal friend, believed that final and permanent action on such a measure as the Volstead law should be considered and adopted only after the return of 2,000,000 men constituting the American Expeditionary Forces in Europe.

It is said that President Wilson really desired to see a plank inserted in the 1920 Democratic platform providing for a change in the alcoholic content prescribed by the Volstead Act, so as to legalize the use of light wines and beer. He mentioned the matter to United States Senator CARTER GLASS, of Virginia, chairman of the committee on resolutions at the Democratic National Convention in San Francisco in 1920, who opposed the suggestion on the ground it would submerge the League of Nations issue to—a bitter struggle over the single issue of prohibition.

WILSON ADVOCATED A FORM OF STATE OPTION

Under date of January 20, 1924, the then ex-President Wilson prepared a tentative platform to be submitted for the consideration of the platform committee of the next ensuing Democratic National Convention. In this document he took the attitude that under the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act the National Government should confine its activities exclusively—to protect the country against illegal importation from abroad and from illegal introduction of liquor from one State into another—that the full performance of this duty will tax the resources of the Federal Government to the uttermost.

For the rest of enforcement, he contended, there should be frank recognition of the fact "each State must look to their State governments." He gave his reasons for this latter position as follows:

The protection of the people of a State against the illegal sale within it of liquor illegally manufactured within it is a task for which the State governments are peculiarly fitted and which they should perform. That part of the task involves diversified governmental action and adaptation to the widely varying conditions in and the habits and sentiments of the people of the several States. It is a task for which the Federal Government is not fitted. To relieve the States from the duty of performing it violates our traditions and threatens the best interests of our country.

It seems obvious that Mr. Wilson's intention was that those States that desired strict enforcement should have it, and that those States that desired less stringent enforcement features under the act might be equally accommodated. He evidently believed this would make for a more contented people and, therefore, a happier Nation.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN FAVORED TEMPERANCE, BUT NOT PROHIBITION

Abraham Lincoln is frequently quoted by prohibition sponsors, but as a matter of fact Abraham Lincoln did not favor the curbing of men's personal inclinations by law. He asked for no law to compel men to be total abstainers. Lincoln regarded prohibition as "a species of intemperance in itself." Shortly before he made his great temperance speech before the Washington Society in Springfield, Ill., on February 22, 1842, he had voted "no" on a resolution to establish state-wide prohibition in Illinois by vote of its legislature.

EVEN AMERICAN CLERGY IS BECOMING LESS CONVINCED—AFTER THE HYSTERIA COMES THE REACTION

A poll taken among clergymen of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States reveals, according to Time, magazine, 1,032 of them favoring modification of the prohibition law, and 593 against modification, as reported by the Rev. Dr. Charles Livingston, chairman of the publicity committee of the National Episcopal Church Temperance Society.

The ministers as individuals declared prohibition had had sufficient trial.

A tabulation of the vote in the survey follows:

Is prohibition a success in your locality?
Yes, 445; no, 745.
Have we had this law long enough for a fair trial?
Yes, 950; no, 621.
Regardless of one's attitude toward the use of liquor, do you believe a prohibition law offers the best solution of the problem of intemperance?
Yes, 624; no, 1,138.
Should the Volstead Act be modified?
Yes, 1,032; no, 593.
Should the prohibition amendment be repealed?
Yes, 825; no, 793.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, a great deal has been said this afternoon as to the obligation of Members of Congress who take the oath of office and who have taken a decided stand on the question of prohibition and the eighteenth amendment. I want to respectfully submit that it is within the power and the right of every Member of Congress to advocate a change in the Constitution by proper and constitutional methods. [Applause.] Some of us represent constituencies entirely different in viewpoint on this question. In our representative capacity we are invoking every proper, legitimate means, every constitutional means, of bringing about a change in the prohibition situation in keeping with the desires and wishes of our constituency.

Article V of the Constitution provides the means by which the Constitution may be amended. It is not a fixed and inflexible instrument. The fact that you put the eighteenth amendment on it is indicative that when the majority of the people of three-fourths of the States wish to have the eighteenth amendment taken away it will be taken away. It may some day, or perhaps its intents so narrowed as to make its enforcement compatible with conditions in all parts of the country. What some are trying to do is to bring the facts and conditions brought about by prohibition home to the American people. If perhaps in our zeal we overdo it, that is only one of the means of bringing home the point. In that respect I will say that there has been as much overzeal displayed on the dry side as has been on the wet side. It is the belief of some Members of Congress, I fear, that opposition to the policy of prohibition precludes a Member from seeking a constitutional amendment. We have as much right to argue for the repeal of the eighteenth amendment as for any other provision in the Constitution. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Mr. Chairman, this amendment ought not to prevail; if adopted it would reduce the penalties rather than increase them, the very opposite of the purpose of the bill.

In regard to what has been said about parties who may or may not be in the gallery. I am reliably informed that in the gallery to-day there are members of an organization opposed to prohibition; and I wish you to bear in mind that in the city of Washington there is an organization opposed to the prohibition law with all the resources and with men of ability, as clever lobbyists as can be found in the prohibition forces. So as far as that goes there is a perfect stand-off. Let us not be misled from the real question at hand by statements as to who is and who is not in the gallery.

Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the pending amendment be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from South Dakota.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this bill and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not make that motion.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. I move that all debate on this section close in 15 minutes, and all amendments thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BOYLAN) there were—ayes 143, noes 31.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BLACK of New York: Page 1, line 10, after the colon insert: "Provided, That such penalties shall not be imposed in a case where a conviction has been had after testimony by a prohibition agent who has at any time been convicted of a crime."

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that on the ground that it is an effort to change the rules of evidence.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman reserve his point of order?

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, as the committee knows, I generally do not talk on this question, and I am doing it only in response to the demand made yesterday by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. WHITE] that a Patrick Henry appear on the scene. [Applause and laughter.]

This ghastly bill is the last word in legislative inebriety. It is written in the ink of intolerance with the pen of Puritanism. It suggests Lord Jeffreys, Bluebeard, and the slave galleys. Mesmerized by prohibition potentates, Congress would bring about a reign of terror in America. Instead of recalling Patrick Henry we are recalling Fouquier-Tinville, the prosecutor of the French Revolution. The House does not need a medical doctor but a psychiatrist. If we had a guillotine working overtime on every public square we could not enforce prohibition, for three reasons:

First. It is repugnant to the age-long ubiquitous appetite of man for alcohol.

Second. Americans resent a theory of any religion sanctioned by jail punishment. If the Catholics got control of the Government and passed a law prohibiting the eating of meat on Friday, every Methodist on that day would constitute himself a one-man barbecue and get high blood pressure to show his Americanism. [Laughter and applause.]

Third. Prohibition has been a Klondike for the underworld. As the gold seekers took every risk to get the precious metal, so will the bootleggers take every chance to get their profits out of American hypocrisy. A dry yesterday said this bill would stop such things as happened in Chicago. Well, if a bootlegger will take a chance with death from hijackers and hijackers will take a chance with the legal death penalty, they will not worry about the 5-year penalty of this bill.

I say, glory to Judges Brennan and Murphy, of Detroit, who refuse to impose life imprisonment on prohibition violators. If Michigan could only send us more Murphys and Brennans instead of Cramtons and Hudsons such laws as these would not see daylight. Not that I have anything against either Mr. CRAMTON or Mr. HUDSON, because every now and then they follow my dear old leader of Tammany, Old Sitting Bull, JOHN CAREW. [Laughter.]

According to this act, the Master Himself would go to jail for five years for the miracle at Cana.

This is a bill for the shake-down racketeers clothed with official power and the blessing of the Anti-Saloon League.

What about the Hoover commission? Are you afraid to let Hoover experiment with the noble experiment? Have the drys lost faith in their champion even though he has forgotten the good services of Colonel Donovan? Have they moral biliousness waiting for the millennium?

It is a great eighteenth amendment. Here are the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States playing button, button, who's got the button, with the $24,000,000 appropriation. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN, Mr. BOYLAN, and Mr. WHITE of Colorado rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that the gentleman had an amendment to offer.

Mr. GREEN. I move to strike out the last word, which is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a pro forma amendment. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. WHITE of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk:

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WHITE of Colorado: Page 1, line 3, after the word "That," strike out the remainder of line 3, all of lines 4 to 14, inclusive, and insert:

"Whenever in a criminal prosecution under the provisions of the national prohibition act, as amended and supplemented, for the illegal manufacture, sale, transportation, importation, or exportation of intoxicating liquor, as defined by section 1, title 2, of said act, and the jury, in case of conviction, or the court, in case of plea of guilty, shall also find that the defendant is a habitual violator of said national prohibition act, the court shall impose upon each defendant so convicted a fine not to exceed $10,000 or imprisonment not to exceed five years, or both."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk:

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BOYLAN: Page 1, lines 9 and 10, after the words "shall be" strike out the remainder of the sentence and insert: "placed on probation if a first or second offender," after which strike out the balance of the section.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BOYLAN. For the purpose of explaining my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been fixed, and all time has expired.

Mr. BOYLAN. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. I object.

Mr. BOYLAN. I thank the gentleman for his courtesy.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. This act shall not repeal nor eliminate any minimum penalty for the first or any subsequent offense now provided by the said national prohibition act.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill favorably to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not necessary. Under the rule the committee rises automatically if there is no further amendment.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN] may move to strike out the last word.

Mr. GREEN. I make that request.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from Florida will be recognized.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, the other day we had a party vote, where among the Democrats all those who were dry voted for a bill which would have granted prohibition enforcement, but in order in a way to try to pull Mr. Mellon out of a hole our friends on the left—the Republicans—did not accept that, and, joining with the wet wing of the Democratic Party, defeated it.

The situation is this: Our friends on the left would like to redeem themselves with prohibition forces in America; so I ask my colleagues on the Democratic side, in enabling them to redeem themselves, we may now get a prohibition vote.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman is out of order. He is not talking about the last word. He is entering upon a political discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida will proceed in order.

Mr. GREEN. I deplore and decry the fact that some of my colleagues will hurl such aspersions at a great organization which has done and is now doing so much for the moral and spiritual destiny of our Nation. I refer to the Anti-Saloon League.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. The gentleman is not confining himself to the pro forma amendment. He is not discussing the last word. He is discussing the Anti-Saloon League. I ask that the gentleman confine his remarks to the motion now pending under the rules of the House.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, you may discuss anything in the bill, and that is a part of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is discussing the last word in the bill.

Mr. GREEN. Yes. The last word of this bill is the word "act," and if ever there was a time for the American people to act, that time is now, to act for prohibition. [Applause.] It says "act," and by your act this afternoon you should convince the bootleggers of the Nation that you represent dry constituencies and that America shall be dry in fact. [Applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN. No; I have so little time, I am sorry. We have recently read in the newspapers a great deal about the Washington bootleggers getting orders to prepare bootleg liquor for those who come to the inauguration. This nullification is outrageous.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman moved to strike out the word "act." He is now arguing to maintain the act.

Mr. GREEN. I am talking of what has happened because of lack of proper action of the gentleman's own political party. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the paragraph.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota moves that all debate on this section be now closed. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. You are trying to work the gag rule. I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded. Those in favor of closing debate on this section will rise and stand until they are counted.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 144, noes 35.

So the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate being closed, the committee automatically rises.

Thereupon, pursuant to the rule, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BEGG, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having under consideration the bill (S. 2901) to amend the national prohibition act, as amended and supplemented, reported that that committee had directed him to report the same back to the House without amendment, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. As many as favor the passage of the bill will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay." The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 284, nays 90, not voting 54, as follows:

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that all Members may have three legislative days in which to extend their remarks upon the bill just passed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE PROHIBITION ENFORCEMENT ACT

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Mr. Speaker, on the question of prohibition I have been as neutral on the subject as my conscience will allow me.

In all of my campaigns for a Member of Congress, I have been opposed by the so-called Anti-Saloon League. They have consistently indorsed my opponent. However, it has never affected my election as is indicated in the last one whereby my opponent was indorsed by the Anti-Saloon League and still I received a majority of nearly 22,000.

In making this statement, I do it not with the thought that I am peeved at their action but merely to lay a foundation for the few remarks that I am to make.

Being a distiller for 28 years and operating one of the largest plants in the United States I am classified as a wet. However, I would desire that the Members of the House should realize that before prohibition went into effect my firm disposed of every drop of spirits that they owned, and therefore since prohibition has been a law the firm have not sold, transported, or disposed of spirituous liquors.

I have held myself in readiness to be of any assistance to the Government that I could in bringing about a law or regulations that would be helpful to the cause. What I mean is this: The Constitution now contains the prohibition law and the laws affecting it are probably inoperative and it may be necessary in the future to change them. No matter how inoperative they are, I have always contended that prohibition should be given a fair chance. In other words, every opportunity should be given those who are favorable to it to make it a success, if they can. Then, if that is done by the Congress of the United States and they fail, they should then consider the change of the law. I have always thought that the drastic law is the cause of nonenforcement.

Some time ago, if you will recall, I made a speech on the floor of the House indicating a thought that I had of liberalizing under the law by medicinal use of whisky by having it manufactured on a basis of 10 cents a gallon profit by selling it for medicinal use through the druggist, and that he should not make more than 100 per cent, thus allowing good 4-year-old Government whisky to be sold at 80 or 90 cents a pint.

This, as I said before, would eliminate the bootlegger, would cause the unscrupulous druggist not to mix the whisky with cheaper goods, because the profit would be too small to cause him to do so and would guarantee to the purchaser a good, wholesome medicinal whisky at pre-war prices. I also believed when I made that statement that that would eliminate largely the desire that exists under present conditions.

I am going to give the House some figures, not for the purpose of influencing you on this bill, but I think they are figures that should be in the RECORD. I therefore have taken the years of 1911, 1912, and 1913, which were the banner years for distilling, and I quote you as follows, by years:

	Gallons
1911	183, 355, 527
1912	187, 571, 808
1913	193, 606, 257
Making a total in three years' time of	564, 533, 592
Or an average of	188, 177, 864

Now, in comparison to that, I have taken the years of 1926, 1927, and 1928, since prohibition has been in effect, which are as follows:

	Gallons
1926	203, 809, 944
1927	185, 471, 897
1928	169, 149, 904
Making a total in three years' time of	558, 431, 745
Or an average of	186, 143, 915

Thus you can see by this that we are making now within 2,000,000 gallons per year of spirits, compared to what we did previous to prohibition.

The argument, of course, on these figures will be that the first quotation was under the law and for beverage purposes, while the second, under the law, was for mechanical purposes, or denatured alcohol. However, I have not the figures to verify my statement, but, knowing the business as I do, I think I am correct in making this statement that as we had denatured alcohol back as far as 1908 and that while it has grown largely in proportion as to what it was then, it has not grown to any extent as exists in these figures and, besides, large portions of the denatured alcohol of to-day are merely taking the place of tax-paid alcohol in previous years. I use Listerine as an example. At one time they were tax paying two to three cars every week for their uses. Now they simply send their ingredients to Peoria and pay no tax.

That applies to other manufacturers in the same way.

Making the deductions in my own way, I am convinced that a large portion of the 186,000,000 gallons of alcohol being made to-day is used for beverage, more than half at least.

Now I want to call your attention to some other figures that might be interesting to the House. I have taken the years 1911, 1912, and 1913 as a basis for importation of spirits from foreign countries which would cover everything and they are as follows:

	Gallons
1911	3, 674, 354
1913	4, 080, 710

So, you can see by these figures that there were less than 4,000,000 gallons imported during the previous period, and it is my belief and judgment, not only from statements that we have in the newspapers but of the confiscations that are reported, there are at least twenty times as much liquor coming from foreign countries under the smuggling process as there was under the legal process.

I have not said anything in reference to the illegal manufacture of spirits, but knowing the procedure and understanding how easily it is made and how correct the bootlegger can be in the manufacture so as to make it palatable, I would not be surprised, if the truth were known, but what the quantity illegally made at the present time would be surprising in gallons if it could be computed to this Congress.

Now, after making this statement, which is done for the purpose of getting the facts before you, I am going to state what I am going to do in reference to this bill. Ever since I have been in Congress I have voted consistently for every appropriation to enforce prohibition because it is a law and a part of the Constitution and because I have believed that it was my duty as a Congressman to lend every assistance to those who are in power on this subject and to give them all of the money that they need for a try out of prohibition.

I believe this is a bad bill for them. It is my thought, as expressed on the floor of this House by Congressman FORT, that this law will be more injurious to the cause than it will be of benefit. But, on the other hand, I am still going to do what I started out to do when I came to Congress, to let those who favor prohibition run it up to a point where it is found they can or can not carry it out successfully, if that time ever comes, and I am voting against my best judgment on this bill—I am going to vote for it.

Mr. WATRES. Mr. Speaker, I am as anxious as any Member to strengthen the cause of law enforcement in every way possible. I am opposed to the bill under consideration because I am convinced that its effect will be to weaken rather than to strengthen the enforcement of the law. I am not, however, in sympathy with many of the arguments made against the bill by those who are opposing prohibition enforcement.

It is conceded even by the advocates of the bill that it will increase the difficulty of securing convictions.

I recognize that it is the function of Congress to provide adequate laws for enforcement. The present bill makes possible an extremely tyrannical, oppressive, and unreasonable application of the law, resulting in resentment against it and less respect for the law. I feel thoroughly convinced that the best hope for improving conditions is through placing greater emphasis on law observance rather than on law enforcement.

Mr. Hoover has stated that he intends to appoint a commission to consider ways and means of improving present conditions. He will take office on Monday next. Congress should await recommendations from that commission.

It is a pageant intended to reproduce the historical events of that section of the Nation before and immediately after the Revolution. There is precedent for this resolution. To the Stone Mountain celebration, we sent a representation of Congress. The resolution carries no appropriation at all.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

Amendment numbered 1: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by said amendment insert the following: "from any department of the United States Government"; and the Senate agree to the same.

ADDISON T. SMITH,
W. C. LANKFORD,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentlemen yield for about one minute?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. CRAMTON. Under the conditions, all parties have agreed to this compromise, but I think the RECORD ought to show that some of us do not consider that the action taken on this bill and the one which the gentleman has in his hands is to be taken as a precedent to control future action.

In my judgment the Reclamation Service is the division of the Government which is charged with the responsibility of protecting the interests of the Government in such matters, and it is as unwise to call on the Department of War or Navy or Commerce to act in a matter affecting reclamation as it would be to call on the Reclamation Service to act in a matter affecting the national defense. But in these particular cases, one of them seems to have been under way already under somewhat similar circumstances, and I am not disposed to contest it.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say in reply to the gentleman that the amendment adopted gives the President authority to designate some one from any department of the Government instead of confining it to the Department of the Interior.

The conference report was agreed to.

COMPACTS OR AGREEMENTS BETWEEN THE STATES OF COLORADO, OKLAHOMA, AND KANSAS

The Clerk read the conference report.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

MARY MARTIN HARRISON

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 7244, with a Senate amendment, and agree to the Senate amendment, and I may say that I am doing this by direction of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what does the Senate amendment do?

Mr. BRITTEN. This is the case of an appropriation for the mother of an aviator who was killed in the line of duty. It conveys to the mother eleven hundred and some dollars, or six month's pay. There is some question as to just how dependent the mother was on the son and that is the reason for the bill; otherwise it would not have been necessary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

JOINT-STOCK LAND BANKS

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 4039) to exempt joint-stock land banks from the provisions of section 8 of the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914, as amended, this bill having been considered by the Committee on Banking and Currency and a similar House bill being on the calendar.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman advise us whether there is an identical House bill on the calendar?

Mr. McFADDEN. This is the same bill; this is a Senate bill that I am calling up.

Mr. CRAMTON. I asked the gentleman if there is a House bill on the calendar?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. It is the bill that I objected to the other day.

Mr. CRAMTON. Does it meet with the approbation of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I am not objecting to it.

Mr. CRAMTON. Do they hold any securities of public or private irrigation projects?

Mr. McFADDEN. Not that I know of.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk does not find any similar House bill on the calendar.

Mr. McFADDEN. My recollection is that the House considered the Senate bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. My question was whether there was a similar House bill on the calendar. I think we had better leave it until it can be investigated. I object.

CONSOLIDATION OF CERTAIN TIMBER STANDS ON THE BOUNDARIES OF YOSEMITE NATIONAL PARK

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I call up from the Speaker's table the bill S. 5880, an identical House bill being now on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California calls up the bill S. 5880.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (S. 5880) to provide for the preservation and consolidation of certain timber stands along the western boundary of the Yosemite National Park, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of preserving and consolidating certain timber stands along the western boundary of the Yosemite National Park, the President of the United States is hereby authorized, upon the joint recommendation of the Secretaries of the Interior and of Agriculture, to add to said park by Executive proclamation any or all of the following-described lands: Sections 19, 20, 29, 30, 31, and 32, township 1 south, range 20 east, Mount Diablo meridian; east half section 1; east half section 12; southeast quarter section 24, township 2 south, range 19 east, Mount Diablo meridian; sections 4, 5, and 6; north half section 7; sections 8 and 9, and 19 and 20, township 2 south, range 20 east, Mount Diablo meridian, approximately 9,000 acres.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SABATH. Reserving the right to object, does this take in all of the timber stands?

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. This takes in a very beautiful tract of timber.

Mr. SABATH. Is that the tract in question between the Senate and the House?

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. No; that is still pending in conference.

Mr. SABATH. This will take care of some of it?

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion by Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE OF HON. CLEMENT C. DICKINSON

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the public services of the Hon. CLEMENT C. DICKINSON.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, of the valiant knights who, when knighthood was in flower, rode over medieval France, battling in open field, in tournaments, from castle to castle, and from city to city, in defense of country, liege lord, honor, and virtue, none was more intrepid or more perfectly exemplified heroic courage and all that was best in the romantic age of chivalry than Pierre Terrail, Seigneur, better known as Chevalier de Bayard, acclaimed by his contemporaries and historians as "sans peur et sans reproche" (without fear and without reproach).

He was a perfect pattern of knighthood. Blameless in life, character stainless, actuated by a high sense of honor, dauntless in attack, fearless in defense of truth and virtue, loyal to country and humanity, vigilant champion of right, aggressive in redressing wrongs, his sharp spear and delicately tempered sword unerringly pierced his adversary's armor, and his buckler broke the fierce onslaughts of every foe. While "his bones are now dust, his good sword rust, and his soul is with the saints, we trust," yet in every age of the world's history since he rode forth to battle there have been those who like him excelled in courage, honor, true merit, stainless lives, sincere friendship, and unfailing fidelity to country and duty.

In Missouri, the great Commonwealth that gave me birth, we have had many men whose lives reflected the virtues and chivalric courage of Chevalier Bayard. For 19 years a man of this type has been a Member of this House. I refer to the distinguished gentleman from the sixth district of Missouri, Hon. CLEMENT C. DICKINSON, who, like Bayard of old, has lived a long and useful life, without fear and without reproach, an outstanding type of that high standard of citizenship that is the crowning glory of our civilization.

In all the relations of life CLEMENT C. DICKINSON has been circumspect, sincere, candid, unassuming, upstanding, forward looking, loyal to his friends, conscientious, aggressively wholesome in thought and example, and at all times actuated by well-considered convictions and devotion to duty.

An able and successful lawyer; a faithful servant of his Commonwealth in its general assembly; an honorable Representative of a great district and State in Congress, Judge DICKINSON has acted well his part and discharged with fidelity and distinction his duties and responsibilities, both in private and public life. His escutcheon is unblemished and his record above reproach. His was not a little, shriveled, or pulseless soul. He pulled no man down in order to promote his own politcial fortunes. He had a big heart, and all who know his sterling character and enviable qualities of mind and heart will agree that he has made a worth-while contribution to the forces that promote the public weal.

It is a source of profound regret that he will not be a Member of the Seventy-first Congress, but we do not look on him as one whose public career has ended. Time has dealt gently with him and he is still blessed with a strong body, vigorous intellect, and an admirable, gracious, and benign personality that equip him for many more years of efficient public service.

His failure to be returned to the Seventy-first Congress implies no lack of confidence in him by his constituents, who still hold him in high esteem and appreciate his valuable services in their behalf. He was the victim of unprecedented political conditions which he did not create, could not control, and for which he was not responsible.

It is indeed unfortunate he fell outside the breastworks in the recent political upheaval while many of his colleagues who are less worthy were returned to this Chamber. It is difficult to understand why his public career should have been halted and some of us who are less deserving, less capable, less able, less useful, and less lovable, were elected. But whether or not CLEMENT C. DICKINSON ever returns to public life, the Members of this House well know, his constituents well know, and the people of Missouri well know, that he has with ability, fidelity, distinction, and with signal honor, served his day and generation. Oh, that there were more Members of this House like him, who will not—

> Crook the pregnant hinges of the knee,
> Where thrift may follow fawning.

I am sure I reflect the sentiment of every Member of this House when I say that Judge DICKINSON, when he leaves this Chamber, will carry with him the implicit confidence, genuine good will, and the very best wishes of his colleagues, all of whom sincerely regret his departure and unite with me in saying:

Well done, thou good and faithful public servant.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 16701, and agree to the Senate amendment to provide for the payment of rental to the Board of Commissioners of the Port of New Orleans of the property known as the New Orleans Army Supply Base, New Orleans, La.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were agreed to.

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF THE DEATH OF BRIGADIER GENERAL PULASKI

The SPEAKER. Under authority of House Joint Resolution 304 providing for the observance and commemoration of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the death of Brig. Gen. Casimir Pulaski, and establishing a commission to be known as the United States Pulaski Sesquicentennial Commission, the Chair appoints the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD].

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 17223, the deficiency appropriation bill, disagree to all of the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. Also, that the managers on the part of the House on H. R. 17223, the second deficiency appropriation bill, and H. R. 15848, the first deficiency bill, be authorized to agree to Senate amendments notwithstanding the provisions of clause 2 of Rule XX.

The purpose of this request is this: Unless this is granted we will have to bring back here all of the amendments put on by the Senate, whether we agree to them or not, because they are new items of legislation.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, if we agree to that unanimous consent request the House will not have an opportunity to vote on the $24,000,000 amendment if the conferees accept it.

Mr. WOOD. This would only embrace those items that are not controversial. It is for the purpose of expediting and saving time, and the possibility of saving this deficiency bill.

Mr. SCHAFER. Then there is no danger whatever that the House conferees will agree to the $24,000,000 amendment and the House be precluded from having a vote on it?

Mr. WOOD. I can safely promise the gentleman that.

Mr. SCHAFER. Then I shall not object.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON. Is there an item there for $150,000 for the Isthmian Canal? Is there any language in that directing any work or merely an appropriation?

Mr. WOOD. It is just the appropriation, as I understand it. I saw the item yesterday, and it is just the appropriation for the survey of the Nicaraguan canal and the Panama Canal.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I have not been able to hear what has been said, but I caught a word that I am considerably interested in. I reserve the right to object, if this is the proper stage of the proceedings to do that. It is my understanding that this deficiency bill carries the Nicaraguan canal investigation item?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. A piece of legislation, with also an appropriation. That is a matter that is embraced within the bill which has to-day been reported to the House by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and which should come up in some formal way so that opportunity for debate would be afforded. The gentleman's request would give the conferees the authority to agree to that item and it would come in here in such fashion that there would not be any opportunity to discuss it. That would not be at all fair to those who are opposed to it. Having that in mind, I am unable to agree to the gentleman's request, unless that item is excluded from the request.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad that the gentleman has raised this question. In all probability we will have to bring back some matters that may be in disagreement. Our purpose in making this request is that we need not encumber the disagreed items with a whole lot of trivial items that would consume a great deal of time. It is for the purpose of saving time. If there are any of these matters that gentlemen specify they wish brought back, if they are in disagreement, we will be pleased to give them consideration.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I would not be able to grant consent to the gentleman's request without some understanding that this item is not brought back to the House until the House has considered the bill which was reported to-day.

Mr. WOOD. I could not agree to that. If we did that, we would not get this bill back here at all in all probability.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. That is not the fault of those who object to the item. It is rather the fault of those who insist in putting this item in in an improper manner.

Mr. WOOD. I have made the request.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I object to the request.

Mr. DENISON. Would not the gentleman from Alabama be satified if the gentleman from Indiana would say that the item would be brought back to the House before it is approved?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The trouble about that is that the item ought to be debated. The gentleman will bring back a conference report and will have the opposition at his mercy. He need not give them any opportunity to discuss it. For that reason it is not possible to make an agreement. If the gentleman will take that item from his request, I shall not object to it.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 17223, the deficiency appropriation bill, disagree to all of the Senate amendments, ask a conference with the Senate or agree to the conference asked by the Senate; also, that the managers on the part of the House on H. R. 17223, the second deficiency bill, and H. R. 15808, the first deficiency bill, be authorized to agree to Senate amendments notwithstanding the provisions of the clause 2 of Rule XX.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Has the gentleman consulted with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]?

Mr. WOOD. Yes; and also with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT]. This is agreeable to both of those gentlemen.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, in view of the gentleman's motion, I am compelled to make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and ninety-five Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana moves to suspend the rules and take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 17223, the deficiency appropriation bill, disagree to all of the Senate amendments, and ask a conference with the Senate or agree to the conference asked by the Senate. Also, that the managers on the part of the House on H. R. 17223, the second deficiency appropriation bill, and H. R. 15848, the first deficiency bill, be authorized to agree to Senate amendments, notwithstanding the provision of clause 2 of Rule XX.

Is a second demanded?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I demand a second.

Mr. WOOD. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] for 20 minutes.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I will say that the purpose of this motion is to send the second deficiency bill to the conference which the Senate has asked for. I am also asking as a part of this motion that the conferees be directed, notwithstanding section 2 of Rule XX, to agree to certain Senate amendments that otherwise would have to be brought back to the House. The purpose of this is to save time and possibly save this deficiency bill.

That is all there is to it. This practice has been in vogue for some time. I remember about this time at the last session the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Madden, then chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, made a similar motion.

Mr. TILSON. Is this an agreement of the conferees on both sides of the House?

Mr. WOOD. I have conferred with the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. GARRETT and also with the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. BYRNS.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Of course, I am not one of the conferees, but the gentleman advised me of what he desired to do, and I told him it was satisfactory to me. I am not in disagreement with the gentleman. There is nothing unusual about the proceeding.

Mr. WOOD. I spoke to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], who is, or will be, one of the House conferees, and he told me it was entirely agreeable to him.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Would the gentleman mind stating briefly what is the purport of these amendments to which he proposes to bind the House?

Mr. WOOD. I am not proposing to bind the House except on this matter of amendments proposed by the Senate which we would be required to bring back here. I will say to the gentleman that if there are any controversial questions of importance on which we can not agree I will bring them back.

Mr. GRIFFIN. These amendments embrace some of the items put on the bill when it was passed by the Senate?

Mr. WOOD. These only apply to those put on in the Senate.

Mr. GRIFFIN. We have no knowledge of what they are. Can the gentleman give us a line on them?

Mr. WOOD. They have put on some with reference to the expenses of their own chamber. They have put on some with reference to a dead Member, one that I recall, and an amendment with reference to a clerk who has done some special work.

Mr. GRIFFIN. The gentleman says they are not material?

Mr. WOOD. They are not material.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, this is a motion to suspend the rules and to disagree to the Senate amendments to the deficiency bill, to appoint conferees, and to authorize them to agree to the numerous items of legislation which have been incorporated in the bill by Senate amendments.

The bill H. R. 17223 carries numerous items of important legislation. What all of them may be I do not know, and I venture to say that not even the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] himself knows all the items of legislation in this bill. Yet he asks that three Members of the House be authorized as conferees to speak on behalf of the House and to agree to any or all of these items accordingly as they may be advised. He asks that the House abdicate its functions and delegate its power to legislate to the committee of conferees.

Some one said that this is not an unusual procedure. May I say that during my 14 years' membership in the House there has been no occasion on which, for want of a unanimous-consent agreement to send a bill of this kind to conference, has such a motion to suspend the rules been made. And furthermore, may I say that on no previous occasion probably within the legislative life of anyone who may now be a Member of the House has a measure carrying so many items of important legislation, about which the House knows nothing, been presented in a deficiency bill.

A LEGISLATIVE ATROCITY

This is a legislative atrocity which would not be attempted at any other time in a session or at any other hour in a day. It is an atrocity attempted upon the theory that the House will submit to anything under such conditions.

I am especially interested in one particular item added by Senate amendment to this bill—an item of legislation which both authorizes and makes an appropriation for the purpose of investigating the feasibility of the so-called Nicaraguan canal and the cost of constructing and maintaining it. That is one of the items put into the bill by the Senate as an amendment. It is an item about which the Committee on Appropriations knows absolutely nothing.

A year ago a bill was introduced in the Senate to accomplish this purpose. About the time the bill was introduced a Budget estimate of $150,000 was submitted to make the proposed investigation. The amount was so grossly inadequate to what will actually be required for the purpose that you can not think of it as anything more than merely an opening wedge for a great appropriation.

The bill went its course in the Senate. As I am informed, no hearings were held upon it, yet we find that within the last two or three weeks, a very determined effort has been disclosed to put the bill through. Finally, not over two or three days ago, the bill was passed by the Senate.

In order to get it through the Senate, the proponents of the bill were forced to accept an amendment which also authorized an investigation of the possibility of enlarging the present Panama Canal and also of still a third route, the so-called San Blas route over the isthmus. A new estimate came up from the Budget, yet it was for only the same amount of $150,000. To do three or possibly five times the work contemplated by the original bill only the same amount was estimated.

THE BILL WAS "JUGGLED WITH"

When the bill was passed by the Senate it was sent to the House. It was held here upon the Speaker's table for a day or two. The bill was believed to rightfully belong to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. For reasons best known to the Speaker the bill was not so referred. It was merely taken up informally in the committee by the chairman and members of the committee were then informed that a motion to suspend the rules would be made to pass that bill.

Opposition to the bill developed in the committee and obviously the chairman of the committee reached the conclusion that he would not be able to pass a motion to suspend the rules by the required vote. Then what transpired? Then, only this morning, the bill was referred by the Speaker to the committee. No hearings were held by the House committee and no hearings were held by the Senate. Without any real information the committee to-day ordered the bill reported. A minority report was also made in which five members joined in opposition to the bill. That minority report is as follows:

MINORITY VIEWS ON SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 117

If this were a proposal merely to investigate the need for an increase in the facilities of the Panama Canal, we should not oppose it. However, it is obvious that the inclusion of the canal was merely an afterthought, and that the measure has no sincere purpose for such an investigation.

As the resolution was originally drawn it related only to a canal through Nicaragua. The Budget estimate of May, 1928, was for $150,000 for investigation of the Nicaraguan route alone. Amendments were forced into the resolution in the Senate, against the opposition of its proponents, which include an investigation of an enlargement of the Panama Canal and of the so-called San Blas route. To meet these amendments a new estimate of only the same amount, $150,000, has been submitted.

The present use of the Panama Canal averages only 19 vessels daily. Its capacity is more than double that number and when certain improvements now being made are completed the canal's capacity will be 54 vessels daily. It is estimated that even at the present rate of increase in use, such rate being more than improbable, the canal will have sufficient capacity for the next 60 to 70 years.

It is wholly obvious that no emergency exists and that the haste and pressure with which it is sought to force the adoption of this measure is wholly uncalled for so far as any legitimate purpose which it can have. We are therefore warranted in believing that its adoption is sought for some hidden purpose and to accomplish some secret end.

During the last session of Congress the excuse which the administration advanced for keeping our marines in Nicaragua was to preserve order and to help in the election of a president. That election was held months ago, but several thousand of our marines are yet in Nicaragua in violation of the promise to evacuate them. No excuse has been offered for the failure to bring our marines home. We are unwilling to afford the administration such an excuse through the adoption of this resolution. Our position is that we should not further meddle with the internal affairs of Nicaragua, and that we should not take any action with relation to the concession for a Nicaraguan canal until our marines have been withdrawn and the control of their country restored to the Nicaraguans.

ABANDONING ORDERLY PROCESSES OF LEGISLATION

Now we find that the Senate, not content with having passed the measure several days ago, are unwilling to await the orderly processes of legislation, have placed in this deficiency bill an item of legislation which has the same legal effect as the prior bill which is now pending before this body. Without waiting for the House to act upon that bill and without waiting for the House to authorize the appropriation, the Senate has made the appropriation and it is included in this deficiency bill. You are now asked to authorize the conferees on the part of the House to agree to that provision.

I ask you gentlemen: Do you mean to have orderly processes of legislation? Do you desire to have fair and open debate upon matters of great importance, matters which will probably affect our international relations, or are you willing to hide your heads in the sand like an ostrich and let the committee on conference, which has had no hearings and has no information upon the subject, agree to the item and bind your hands in that way?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. For a brief question.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Do I understand that the gentleman objects to the item for investigating the Nicaraguan canal, which was purchased by the Government for several million dollars during the Wilson administration?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. If I have not spoken to very poor purpose, I have gotten that idea over, I should imagine. [Laughter.]

THE FALSE DISGUISE AS AN "EMERGENCY"

This bill is pressed as though it were an emergency measure. We are told that the Panama Canal is inadequate to the demands which are being made on it and that it is very necessary that we take immediate action. There is, so they say, no time to consider this in an orderly and reasonable way. Yet what are the facts? The facts are that the use of the Panama Canal averages only 19 ships a day, while its present capacity is more than double that number. The facts are that we are now improving our water supply by work and when that work is completed, as it will be within a short time, the capacity of the canal will be 54 ships a day.

And what are the further facts? At the present rate of increase in the use of the canal, a rate which can not be maintained because it has been abnormal—a rate which must inevitably reach its peak within a few years—even at that present rate the canal, with the improvements making possible the passage of 54 ships a day, will be adequate for the next 70 years. That is what the Governor of the Canal Zone says.

There is no real purpose and no real desire to investigate the possibilities of enlarging the Panama Canal. It is merely an afterthought—an amendment thrust into the bill in the Senate against the wishes of the proponents of the measure. Their eyes are fixed solely upon Nicaragua. They are thinking of nothing but Nicaragua. The proposed appropriation is intended only for the Nicaraguan situation. And I ask why? Well, there is no reason that can be told to the public. There is no reason that you gentlemen, mere Representatives of the people, are fit to know. You ask me when such a scheme is attempted to be put over to agree to it. I say no. This measure demands debate, the House needs information, and the committee which has charge of this matter should have some opportunity to get that information.

NO REASON FOR INTEMPERATE PRESSURE

If any Member can give me a single reason why we should jam this matter through without giving any opportunity for investigation, then I will gladly yield the floor and accord to those who are advocating the measure the wish of their hearts, the passage of the bill.

Is there any Member present who knows why this measure should be pressed by such extreme measures? Is there anybody here who knows any reason which would make of this an emergency measure? If there be, I will yield to him to tell me what that reason is. What is it? I pause for an answer. Silence, silence.

I observed a moment ago sitting in the Chamber the chairman of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, and I observe before me the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, who is pressing this measure. I ask them, why is this an emergency measure; why can not it wait until the next Congress? No answer comes. [Applause.]

"A BUG UNDER THE CHIP"

Gentlemen, am I not warranted under the circumstances in saying that there is "a bug under this chip?" I do not know what it is. I do not know the nature of the vermin; but I know it is there. I know the bug is there. Of course, we can but speculate. A distinguished Senator said in the Senate last night—and, by the way, in my judgment he is the biggest man around Washington, GEORGE NORRIS—he said that he believed the real purpose of this measure was to afford the administration an excuse for continuing to keep our marines in Nicaragua. I do not say that is the reason, but it looks like a pretty good guess. I do not know what the reason is. Apparently nobody knows, for nobody will tell you. They seem to expect us, sheeplike, to jump the fence behind some leader. I fancy Senator NORRIS's is just about as good a guess as anybody could make.

I said to our chairman—fine gentleman that he is—that I would cheerfully agree to a measure to investigate the possibilities of increasing the facilities of the Panama Canal so that it would take care of any prospective increase in commerce, and asked, "Why do you not strike out the Nicaraguan end of this bill and leave us to investigate merely the enlargement of the Panama Canal?" I hope I do not betray his confidence when I say here in his presence that his reply was "You can not get the bill through in that shape."

So I come back to the statement that the purpose of this bill is to deal with the Nicaraguan canal route, that it has no application to the Panama Canal, and that its proponents do not want it for the purpose of enlarging the Panama Canal. Then I ask, What do they want it for?

Of course, with any fair opportunity for debate——

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes; for a question.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Has the gentleman received, as I have received, letters from back home, apparently, from parties owning land down in Nicaragua, wanting this survey to be made?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. No; I have not. My constituents do not write me much about such things; they always know pretty well what I am going to do.

NO OPPORTUNITY FOR FAIR DEBATE

If we had an opportunity for any fair debate in this Chamber, I would like to discuss the Bryan-Chamorra treaty. I would like to point out the circumstances under which the treaty was signed and how the Nicaraguan Government, for the pitiful sum of $3,000,000, gave us in perpetuity the exclusive right of building a canal across their country. I would like to call attention to the fact that the Chamorra government was merely a puppet government and under the domination of the United States. I would like to go on down the line and present to you the history of the relations between the United States and the Government of Nicaragua, and to show you that our present administration regards Nicaragua as merely an American protectorate.

I am unwilling to send a troop of engineers into Nicaragua as long as we keep the marines there. Let us bring back the marines. Let us cease to meddle with Nicaraguan affairs. Let us accord to Nicaraguans the right of self-government which we assert for ourselves. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. WOOD. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON].

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, the gentleman from Alabama is characteristically suspicious. He generally sees something dark and sinister about any bill he does not agree with. The motion before us is to send this bill to conference. It does not necessarily mean that the conferees will agree to the proposal being discussed, but in the interest of legislation, the bill ought to be sent to conference, and I hope the motion of the gentleman from Indiana will prevail.

The gentleman from Alabama has indicted the former Secretary of State, Mr. Bryan, who was known as a friend of the people, and who was generally interested in the welfare of the people. He was Secretary of State when the treaty with Nicaragua was negotiated. He has indicted a former Democratic administration. The treaty was negotiated under President Wilson's administration. He has indicted the Senate, which approved and consented to the treaty.

We made this treaty with Nicaragua by which that government agreed that, in consideration of the payment of $3,000,000, the United States should be granted the exclusive right to construct an interoceanic canal across the Republic of Nicaragua. And the treaty provided that whenever we got ready to construct the canal an agreement will be entered into between the two countries providing the details of the terms upon which the canal shall be constructed, operated, and maintained.

Nothing can be done until another treaty has been negotiated between the Nicaraguan Government and our Government, which will have to be approved by the Senate. We have no reliable information as to what such a canal would cost or the place it should be constructed. We have had no information about it since the report of the Isthmian Canal Commission made to Congress in 1901. Since then we have constructed the Panama Canal, and our experience has given us a great deal of information about constructing canals that we did not have when the last report was made.

In view of modern developments in the construction of canals, in view of modern improvements in machinery, and in view of our experience in constructing the Panama Canal it is believed that the report of the Isthmian Canal Commission on the practicability and costs of a canal on the Nicaraguan route is out of date and no longer reliable, and that we ought to have a later investigation and report.

The Senate bill now pending before the House merely authorizes an investigation and collection of facts to be reported to the Congress. Why should anyone entertain any fears or suspect any sinister motives back of a mere proposal for an investigation and survey and report of the facts back to Congress? I do not think the gentleman from Alabama is justified in the inference that he draws. I want to say to the House that the Senate resolution has been carefully considered by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and has been reported back to the House entirely changed. We have stricken out all after the enacting clause and reported an entirely new resolution in its place.

This new resolution simply provides for an investigation and survey, first, of the practicability and probable cost of enlarging the locks and other facilities of the Panama Canal; and, second, for an investigation and survey of the practicability and probable cost of the proposed canal across the Republic of Nicaragua; and third, for an investigation and survey of the practicability and probable cost of any other interoceanic canal in the Republic of Panama.

During the month of January this year there passed through the Panama Canal an average of something over 23 vessels a day. During the year 1928 there passed through the canal an average of 19 vessels a day. The total capacity of the canal under the very best and most favorable conditions will be about 54 vessels a day. Our water supply is running low, and we are now arranging to build another reservoir. It will take four or five years to complete that.

If we should undertake to enlarge the capacity of the present canal by the construction of additional lock chambers and the enlargement of other facilities, if that should be found to be practicable, it will take at least 10 years' time to complete the work; and those who are interested in this subject believe that it is the part of wisdom to look ahead and secure the information necessary for legislation if Congress should decide to consider legislation to provide canal facilities for the growing commerce of the future. [Applause.]

Why should we not do that? And while we are getting the information as to the practicability and probable cost of enlarging the Panama Canal to take care of the commerce of the future, why should we not also get information as to the practicability and probable cost of constructing another interoceanic canal where we have the right to construct such a canal by treaty? Why should that arouse anyone's suspicions? The fact is that my friend from Alabama is opposed to our marines being in Nicaragua, and, following the leadership of one Member of another legislative body, he wants to hold up all these appropriations until we withdraw the marines from Nicaragua. I hope the House will not go along with him in that. This proposition is not connected in any way with the maintenance of our marines in Nicaragua. There is no connection between them. Why should the presence of our marines in Nicaragua prevent Congress from obtaining information on the practicability and probable cost of constructing a canal where we have the right to do so under a treaty? The information is not going to hurt anybody. The resolution now before the House does not commit this Government to the construction of any canal or to any other project. It merely seeks information to enable Congress to act intelligently, and to enable us to act in time. We ought not to wait until there is an actual emergency before we secure the information necessary to enable us to pass legislation to meet that emergency.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. NEWTON. It does not commit, and, if I understand the resolution correctly, neither does it emphasize one route over the other or anything of that kind.

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman from Minnesota is correct. It is merely a resolution to authorize an appropriation of $150,000 to be used by the President to secure up-to-date information on these very important subjects which sooner or later must receive the attention of Congress.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Does that include both the investigations in respect to the Panama and Nicaragua?

Mr. DENISON. Yes; and the House resolution places the proposal for the investigation and survey of the Panama Canal first.

Mr. SIMMONS. As I understand it, the question before us now is not this survey. The question is sending the deficiency appropriation bill to conference, with the right of the conferees to make certain violations of the ordinary rules of the House regarding this particular legislation.

Mr. DENISON. In order that this very important bill may pass and become a law before Congress has to adjourn on the 4th of March.

Mr. SIMMONS. And this involves a whole series of amendments that are in conference.

Mr. DENISON. Exactly. The merits of the legislative proposal for these investigations will be presented to the House probably to-morrow. When the resolution, as amended by our committee, is before the House, where it can be seen and understood, I am sure there will be no serious opposition to it. I have for years been intensely interested in our great canal project at Panama. It is the greatest project ever undertaken and successfully completed by any government. I doubt if an interoceanic canal will ever become necessary through Nicaragua. But none of us can see very far into the future, and it is the part of wisdom to look forward as far as we can. All of us ought to be willing to have the best available information that may be needed to enable us to meet this great problem of the world's growing commerce and our own increasing interests.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I do not want anybody here to get it into his head that by voting for the motion that I have made he is committing himself to the Nicaraguan canal proposition. I am opposed to it myself. [Applause.] I do not want anyone here to think this committee is trying to take advantage of this House. Our only purpose is in trying to expedite the passage of this deficiency bill. We have been trying for a long time to get the first deficiency bill passed, and thus far we have failed. If we fail in getting this one passed, a great many of the activities of this Government are going to suffer. I don't believe anybody wants to take any unnecessary responsibility for such a possibility as that. I say to the Members of this House that all that is involved in the question raised by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] is whether or not we shall ascertain the facts with reference to existing conditions concerning the Nicaraguan route. We have to ascertain facts with reference to whether or not it is necessary to build a new dam in Panama. Whether it is necessary to spend millions of dollars to build a road up to the place where they are to build this new dam. All of these things are informative. Even those opposed to the Nicaraguan route will want to know the facts if the matter is ever presented to the House for the establishment of a Nicaraguan route. There is nothing to fear by reason of the adoption of this motion so far as Nicaragua is concerned. The same objection might be made with reference to many other amendments on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana to suspend the rules and send the bill to conference.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HUDDLESTON) there were—ayes 238, noes 6.

So two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the motion agreed to.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, did the Chair announce the vote?

The SPEAKER. I have announced it.

Mr. TILSON. Has the Chair announced the fact that two-thirds had voted in the affirmative?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did. The Chair will announce as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. WOOD, Mr. CRAMTON, and Mr. BYRNS.

A MARRIAGE ANNOUNCEMENT

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a very important announcement to the House, and with the permission of the Speaker I will make it; and that is that our distinguished colleague from New York, Representative LAGUARDIA, was married to-day. [Applause.]

Our ministerial colleague, the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. KVALE, tied the knot, and I move you, sir, that the felicitations of the House be extended to the happy couple. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. It is carried unanimously. [Applause.]

NEW BERN (N. C.) HISTORICAL PAGEANT

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on House Concurrent Resolution No. 60, in relation to the historical pageant at New Bern, N. C., and to include historical statement prepared by the legislative reference bureau of the Library.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, the people of North Carolina are contemplating a great historical pageant during this year, to be held in the city of New Bern, the capital of North Carolina, during the colonial period of our history.

The Legislature of North Carolina has passed a resolution recognizing this great historical occasion as being of national and state-wide importance, and has appointed a committee to attend the celebration. The North Carolina Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution have also passed appropriate resolutions commending this occasion as being one of national and state-wide importance and of great historical value.

The National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution, through its president, Mrs. Alfred E. Brosseau, and also through the chairman of the national legislative committee, Mrs. Edwin C. Gregory, have indorsed this occasion. It is very desirable that the Congress of the United States should be represented on this occasion.

Outside of the national historical significance of the occasion, the people of North Carolina feel that as their State has forged ahead so materially and is now the second State in the Union in the payment of Federal taxes, that it would be mete and proper for the Congress to send representatives for this occasion. We feel that the precedents are ample and, even if they were not, that the occasion justifies the passage of this resolution. The resolution does not call for any more than the appointment of three Members of the Senate and three Members of the House to attend the celebration.

This pageant will be a very elaborate affair and will commemorate the early history of the State of North Carolina, beginning in 1584, when Sir Walter Raleigh sent out expeditions from England and they landed on North Carolina shores, and also the birth of the first white child born of English parentage in America, Virginia Dare; and then will be a picturization of the early Indian tribes and the early colonial history up until the time of the settlement of the State by the French Huguenots and the Swiss, headed by Baron de Graffenreid, the city of New Bern being named for the Swiss city of Berne.

It is the purpose and intent of those in charge of the celebration to have present on this occasion the Swiss ambassador and other notables.

A very beautiful part of the pageant will be the representation of the Spirit of the Cypress, one of the native trees, and then the Sprites of the Rivers, the Neuse and the Trent, these two rivers being named for Indian tribes. Then the pantomime Homeland Memories of the Settlers, concerning the early Indians, with King Hancock, a notable Indian, being represented with his band of Indian braves.

Then will be represented Baron de Graffenreid and the Palatines and the Swiss.

The Quakers will be represented. These were descendants of the early Pennsylvania Quakers who moved from Pennsylvania to North Carolina.

Then will be pictured Pastor Philip de Richebourg and the bagpipers and Scottish young people.

Then will be pictured John Lawson, the great surveyor general of that period.

It may be of interest in this connection to state that John Lawson was out among the Indians with Baron de Graffenreid, and that they were tried by the Indians, and that de Graffenreid was released on the idea that he was a king, and that John Lawson was stripped naked and his body filled with pine splinters and he was burned to death. The narratives of Lawson's doings are of very great historical value, not only from a state-wide standpoint but from a national standpoint as well.

The second act will picture a ball at the Tryon Palace. Governor Tryon will be represented; also Mrs. Tryon, Miss Esther Wake, Richard Caswell, who was afterwards the first Governor of North Carolina under the Constitution, John Ashe, Abner Nash, Rev. James Reed, Mary Hooks, friend of Esther Wake, and Col. Ezekiel Slocumb. Mary Hooks later married Ezekiel Slocumb and was the heroine of the Battle of Monroe Creek Bridge (which the Government has recognized by turning the battle field into a national military park). John Hawks, an early historian of this country, will also be represented. Mr. Tomlinson, an early schoolmaster of the New Bern Academy, will be represented. Mr. Gifford, an actor from Wilmington, Hermon Husband, a Regulator who took part in the war of the Regulators, Mr. Joseph Hewes, a signer of the Declaration, born in New Jersey, in Kingston, in 1730, and moved to North Carolina and was honored by our State, will be represented in the pageant, and many others who took part in the early formation of our Government.

When I introduced this resolution I had the legislative reference service of the Library of Congress to furnish me a brief showing the historical significance of this occasion as it applied to the Nation as a whole, and I am herewith making the same a part of my remarks.

Although the colony which Raleigh undertook to establish in North Carolina was a failure it planted the seed which produced the fruit at Jamestown. His failure contained a lesson and showed the place at which success would be found. His faith in the expansion of English power was communicated to others, the patriotic faith of his colony hung over the imagination of his countrymen, and the cause of colonization was not forgotten. (Bassett, Short History of the United States, 1921, pp. 43, 44.)

Dr. Clarence R. Williams, one of the best historians of the country, who furnished this brief sets forth the principal reasons why this pageant will have national historical signficance. He quotes Bancroft's History of the United States, volume 4, pages 390 and 391, in which it is stated, "The people of North Carolina were the first in America to vote an explicit sanction of independence."

This one fact alone justifies the passage of this resolution. The pageant will also take into consideration and will celebrate the first revolutionary fight at Alamance, the Declaration of Independence, Mecklenburg declaration of independence, the famous Edenton tea party, Battle of Moores Creek Bridge, Battle of Guilford Court House, Battle of Kings Mountain, and other matters of state-wide and national importance.

NORTH CAROLINA AND AMERICAN HISTORY

NORTH CAROLINA AND COLONIAL HISTORY

North Carolina possesses the site of the first attempt of the English to plant a colony within the present bounds of the United States, and here was born Virginia Dare, "first offspring of the English race in what is now the United States," on the 18th of August, 1585.

The efforts of Sir Walter Raleigh to plant a colony on Roanoke Island and the pathetic and romantic story of the "lost colony" are too well known to require repetition.

Although this colony proved a failure, Raleigh "did, indeed, at Roanoke Island plant the seed which produced fruit at Jamestown. His failure contained a lesson and showed the place at which success would be found. His faith in the expansion of English power was communicated to others, the pathetic faith of his colony hung over the imagination of his countrymen, and the cause of colonization was not forgotten." (Bassett, Short History of the United States, 1921, pp. 43, 44.)

NORTH CAROLINA AND INDEPENDENCE

The people of North Carolina were the first in America to vote an explicit sanction to independence.

"North Carolina, proud of its victory over domestic enemies, and roused to defiance by the arrival of Clinton in their great river, met in congress at Halifax on the 4th of April [1776]; on the 8th appointed a select committee, of which Harnett was the head, to consider the usurpations and violences of the British Parliament and King; on the 12th, after listening to its report, unanimously 'empowered their delegates in the Continental Congress to concur with the delegates of the other colonies in declaring independency and forming foreign alliances.' At the same time they reserved to their colony the sole right of framing its own constitution and laws. The people of North Carolina were the first in America to vote an explicit sanction to independence." (George Bancroft, History of the United States, N. Y., Appleton, 1884. Vol. IV, pp. 390, 391. Quoted from the author's last revision.) (Italics added.)

The events in North Carolina during the summer of 1775 which preceded this decisive step are recounted by Bancroft in the following words:

"In North Carolina, fourth among the thirteen colonies in importance, all classes, for the distance of a hundred miles from the sea, were penetrated with enthusiasm for liberty. Men whom royalists revered as of 'the first order of people in the country,' of unblemished integrity and earnest character, loyal by nature, after thoughtful consideration decided irrevocably against the right of the British Parliament to tax the colonies. In Brunswick County Robert Howe, formerly captain of Fort Johnston, employed himself in training the people to arms. At New Bern, the capital whose name kept in memory that its founders were from Switzerland, volunteers formed themselves into independent companies.

"On the waters of Albemarle Sound, over which the adventurous skiffs of the first settlers of Carolina had glided before the waters of the Chesapeake were known to Englishmen, the movement was assisted by the writings of young James Iredell from England, by the letters and counsels of Joseph Hewes, and by the calm wisdom of Samuel Johnston, of Edenton, a native of Dundee in Scotland, a man revered for his integrity, thoroughly opposed to revolution if it could be avoided without yielding to oppression. Using a power with which the last Provincial Congress had invested him, on the 10th of July he summoned the people of North Carolina to elect their delegates. Two days later Dartmouth wrote from the King: 'I hope that in North Carolina the governor may not be reduced to the disgraceful necessity of seeking protection on board the King's ships'; and just then Martin took refuge on board a British man-o-war.

"Richard Caswell, hastening home from the general congress and reluctantly admitting the necessity of American resistance, advised the most resolute conduct and even censured the New Bern committee for suffering the governor to escape.

"On the 21st of August [1775] the people of North Carolina assembled at Hillsboro in a convention of more than 180 members. A spirit of moderation controlled their zeal. * * * In a vituperative, incoherent proclamation, Martin [the royal governor] had warned them against assembling as tending to unnatural rebellion; they voted his proclamation 'a false and seditious libel,' and ordered it to be burnt by the hangman. They professed allegiance to the King and resistance to parliamentary taxation. They resolved that the people of the Province, singly and collectively, were bound by the acts of the Continental Congress and their provincial convention, because in both they were represented by persons chosen by themselves. * * *

"The meditated resistance involved a treasury, which for the time was supplied by an emission of paper money; the purchase of ammunition and arms; a regular force of 1,000 men; an organization of the militia of the colony; an annual provincial congress to be elected by all freeholders; a committee of safety for each of the six districts into which the Province was divided; a provincial council, consisting of the president of the convention and two members from each of the six divisions, as the great executive power. * * *

"On the 24th [of August, 1775], Franklin's plan of a confederacy was introduced by William Hooper. * * * The proposition was about to be adopted when Johnston interposed, and on the 4th of September it was voted, but not unanimously, that a general confederation ought only to be adopted in the last necessity. Hooper acquiesced; and the house, in its address to the inhabitants of the British Empire, unanimously disavowed the desire for independence, asking only to be restored to the state existing before 1763." (Bancroft, History of the United States. 1884, Vol. IV, pp. 258–260.)

The events leading up to the action of North Carolina in authorizing her delegates to support independence have been described by John Spencer Bassett, a native of North Carolina, as follows:

"By the close of 1775 only the exporters and merchants of England thought of yielding to America. As further notice of the unyielding intention of the British, Falmouth, Me. (Portland), was burned in October and Norfolk, Va., on January 1, 1776. * * * It was now so evident that the Colonies must submit or fight that most of the Conservatives gave up their opposition to independence. * * *

"By the spring of 1776 the Conservatives were driven to the last ditch. They desired some form of colonial home rule which should preserve British sovereignty and leave the Colonies a large measure of self-direction. They were strong in the Middle Colonies, especially in Pennsylvania and New York, where the older settlements felt much apprehension at the prospect of a democratic upheaval which should disturb the political center of gravity. New England, Virginia, and North Carolina were clearly with the Radicals and South Carolina and Georgia were undecided. * * *

"While Congress thus hesitated in hope of uniting the two factions within its membership, North Carolina, the one democratic southern Colony, authorized her delegates at Philadelphia to support independence. It was the step uppermost in the minds of the Radicals, and other Colonies followed rapidly. May 15 Congress advised the Colonies to continue no longer in the parlous state in which they then were, but to erect themselves into States, with governments resting on the consent of the people. The advice had already been anticipated by Virginia, where a convention met on May 5, and on the 15th declared Virginia independent of Great Britain. This action by the oldest and largest of the thirteen Colonies had a most powerful effect on the hesitating ones. * * *

"June 7 Richard Henry Lee, of Virginia, gave further evidence of the leadership his State had assumed when he introduced in Congress three important resolutions. They declared: (1) That the thirteen Colonies were and ought to be free and independent, * * *." (Bassett, John Spencer, A Short History of the United States. New York, Macmillan, edition of 1921, pp. 186, 187. Italics added.)

The feeling at this time of the people of North Carolina is graphically described by Hooper and Penn, the former writing to their colleague, Hewes, who with them represented North Carolina in the Continental Congress in Philadelphia, under date of April 17, after arrival at Halifax, N. C.:

"The language of Virginia is uniformly for independence. If there is a single man in the Province who preaches a different doctrine, I had not the fortune to fall in his company. But rapid as the change has been in Virginia, North Carolina has the honor of going far before them. Our late instructions (passed April 12) afford you some specimen of the temper of the present Congress and of the people at large. It would be more than unpopular—it would be Toryism—to hint the possibility of future reconciliation."

At the same time Penn was writing John Adams—

"As I came through Virginia I found the inhabitants desirous to be independent from Britain. However, they were willing to submit their opinion on the subject to whatever the General Congress, i. e., the Continental Congress, should determine. North Carolina by far exceeds them, occasioned by the great fatigue, trouble, and danger the people have undergone for some time past. Gentlemen of the first fortune in the Province have marched as common soldiers; and to encourage and give spirit to the men have footed it the whole time, Lord Cornwallis with seven regiments is expected to visit us every day, Clinton is now in Cape Fear with Governor Martin, who has about 40 sail of vessels, armed and unarmed, waiting his arrival. The Highlanders and regulators are not to be trusted. Governor Martin has coaxed a number of slaves to leave their masters in the lower parts; everything base and wicked is practiced by him. These things have wholly changed the temper and disposition of the inhabitants that are friends of liberty; all regard or fondness for the King or nation of Britain is gone; a total separation is what they want. Independence is the word most used. They ask if it is possible that any colony, after what has passed, can wish for a reconciliation? The convention has tried to get the opinion of the people at large. I am told that in many countries there was not one dissenting vote." (Quoted from Conner, R. D. W., History of North Carolina, Vol. I, pp. 396, 397. Italics added.)

The account of how this resolution was passed and its precise wording is briefly stated as follows:

"The Fourth Provincial Congress of North Carolina, meeting at Halifax on April 4, 1776, on the 8th appointed a committee 'to take into consideration the usurpation and violence attempted and committed by the King and Parliament of Great Britain against America, and the further measures to be taken for frustating the same, and for the better defense of this Province.'"

On April 12 the committee submitted the following which was unanimously adopted by the provincial congress:

"Resolved, That the Delegates for this Colony in the Continental Congress be impowered to concur with the Delegates of the other Colonies in declaring independency and forming foreign alliances, reserving to this Colony the sole and exclusive right of forming a constitution and laws for this Colony, and of appointing Delegates from time to time (under the direction of a general representation thereof), to meet the Delegates of the other Colonies for such purposes as shall be hereafter pointed out." (Conner, History of North Carolina, Vol. I, p. 398. Italics added.)

A copy of this resolution was immediately sent to Philadelphia to Joseph Hewes, then representing the Colony in the Continental Congress, to be laid before that body. "Its effect on the movement for independence was immediate and widespread. The newspapers gave it wide publicity. Leaders in the Continental Congress hastened to lay it before their constituents." "I hope to see my native Colony follow this laudable example," wrote Elbridge Gerry of Massachusetts, John Adams, Samuel Adams, and Caesar Rodney of Delaware wrote to like effect.

"On May 15, Virginia followed North Carolina's lead, and on the 27th of the same month, just after Joseph Hewes had presented to the Continental Congress the resolution of the North Carolina Congress, the Virginia Delegates presented their instructions. Virginia had gone one step further than North Carolina, for while the latter 'impowered' her Delegates to 'concur' with the other Colonies in declaring independence, the former 'instructed' her Representatives to 'propose' it. Hence it was that Richard Henry Lee, of Virginia, and not Joseph Hewes, of North Carolina, won the distinction of moving 'that these United Colonies are and of right ought to be free and independent States' [June 7]." (Conner, History of North Carolina, Vol. I, p. 399. Italics added.)

Among other writers emphasizing the same fact the following may be quoted, in which we have put in italics the statements:

"North Carolina was thoroughly aroused by the Tory peril that was stemmed at Moore's Creek and by the presence of a hostile foe under Sir Henry Clinton on the Cape Fear River. Her provincial convention was the first body of the kind to give explicit approval to the proposal of independence (April 13, 1776), and the same day it appointed a committee to prepare a tentative draft of a constitution." (Nevins, Allan, The American States During and After the Revolution, N. Y., Macmillan, 1924, p. 111.)

"This was the first vote in America giving explicit sanction to independence. Some of the Colonies were loth to separate from the English Government for fear of losing satisfactory internal governments. This was not the case in this Colony. The distractions of internal administration had so alienated its affections that it was not loathe to part with the system. But the colonists were jealous of weaving their internal governments with those of the other Colonies. This Province specifically reserved for itself the power of making its own laws and establishing its own form of government." (Sikes, E. W., The Transition of North Carolina from Colony to Commonwealth, Baltimore, Johns Hopkins Press, 1898, p. 59.)

"North Carolina was the first Colony to act as a unit in favor of independence. It was fourth in importance of the United Colonies. Its provincial congress had organized the militia, and vested the public authority in a provincial council for the whole Colony, committees of safety for the districts, and county and town committees."

After quoting from the resolution of April 12, 1776, and telling how it was passed unanimously, the writer goes on to say:

"Thus the popular party carried North Carolina as a unit in favor of independence, while the Colonies—from New England to Virginia—were in solid array against it [sic]. The example was warmly welcomed by the patriots and commended for imitation. The bold instructions and the military triumph were the sequence of the King's expedition. The royal indignation was soon (May 5, 1776) embodied in a proclamation, declaring a rebellion in North Carolina but promising pardon to all who would return to their duty except Cornelius Harnett and Robert Howe." (Frothingham, Richard, The Rise of the Republic, Boston, Little, Brown, 1890, pp. 502, 504.)

"North Carolina alone bound her inhabitants in honor to obey the acts of the Congress to which she was sending Delegates [i. e., the Continental Congress]." (S. van Tyne, Claude H., Causes of the War of Independence, 1922, p. 438.)

NORTH CAROLINA AND THE REVOLUTION

As the Encyclopedia Britannica says: "North Carolina fought under Washington at Brandywine and Monmouth and played a still more important part in the southern campaigns of 1778–1781. The State was twice invaded, in 1776 and in 1780–81, and two important battles were fought upon her soil, Moore's Creek on the 27th of February, 1776, and Guilford Courthouse on the 15th of March, 1781." (Encyclopedia Britannica, 11th ed., Vol. XIX, p. 777.)

North Carolina had a part also in the great victory of Kings Mountain, of which Bancroft speaks as follows:

"The victory at Kings Mountain, which in the spirit of the American soldiers was like the rising at Concord, in its effects like the successes at Bennington, changed the aspect of the war. The loyalists of North Carolina no longer dared rise. It fired the patriots of the two Carolinas with fresh zeal. It encouraged the fragments of the defeated and scattered American Army to seek each other and organize themselves anew. It quickened the North Carolina Legislature to earnest efforts. It inspirited Virginia to devote her resources to the country south of her border. The appearance on the frontiers of a numerous enemy from the settlements beyond the mountains, whose very names had been unknown to the British, took Cornwallis by surprise, and their success was fatal to his intended expedition. He had hoped to step with ease from one Carolina to the other, and from these to the conquest of Virginia; and he had now no choice but to retreat." (Bancroft, History of the United States, 1885, Vol. V, p. 400.)

It is true that the battle field of Kings Mountain is in South Caroline, about a mile and a half south of the North Carolina line (though the mountain itself, which is 16 miles in length, extends across the State boundary), but in the battle the men of North Carolina played their part and played it well.

The second British invasion of the South began with the seizure of Savannah, December, 1778, and the surrender by Lincoln of Charleston, May, 1780. South Carolina was at the mercy of the enemy and Clinton, thinking the province well conquered, returned to New York, leaving to Cornwallis the task of extending the conquest into North Carolina. The Continental Congress sent Gates the "hero of Saratoga," down (against the advice of Washington), who was crushingly defeated at Camden, S. C., August 16. After his flight to North Carolina he was succeeded in command in the South by General Greene, the choice of Washington, who was appointed on December 2, 1780.

"Before that time the British had met their first check in the South, at Kings Mountain, October 7, 1780. After Camden, Cornwallis moved into North Carolina, gathering food and horses. He halted at Charlotte * * * while Major Ferguson, with 1,000 Tories, scoured the country to the west, collecting supplies and enlisting recruits; for that country was strongly loyal. The Whigs fled before him and alarm spread even to the transmontane settlements of Watauga and Kentucky. From this distant region, bands of mounted men, under leaders of their own choosing, marched eastward, September 26, to bag Ferguson. Having crossed the mountains, they were joined by 510 North Carolinians and 400 South Carolinians, a total force of 1,800. Ferguson heard of their approach and moved toward Charlotte (where Cornwallis was). Thirty-five miles from that place he came to Kings Mountain, the northern end of which is cut by the State line. It is a hill 60 feet high, flat at the top, a third of a mile long, and Ferguson believed it impregnable. On its top he placed his 900 men and awaited attack. The Whigs were riding hard behind, and October 7, a picked band of the best mounted arrived at the hill, surrounded its base, and began a vigorous attack. On alternate sides they charged up the slopes and then fell back, using whatever cover they could find. Early in the fight, Ferguson was killed, and at the end of an hour the white flag was raised; 700 survivors surrendered; the rest were slain. It was a small battle, reckoned by the numbers engaged; but it was very important. It forced Cornwallis back into South Carolina, it gave courage to the Whigs in the Carolinas, and it checked the advance of the British until Greene could arrive and organize his defense. It marked the change of the tide in the South." (Bassett, Short History of the United States, 1921, p. 208.)

"The battle had lasted about an hour. No victory could be more complete. Ferguson's corps was entirely wiped out. Himself and 119 of his men were killed, 123 wounded, and 664 captured. This signal achievement had cost the Americans 28 killed, 62 wounded. It was the first ray of light to pierce the general gloom which had enveloped the country since the fall of Charleston. Washington saw in it 'a proof of the spirit and resources of the country'; Clinton lamented it as a 'fatal catastrophe.' Everywhere patriots hailed it as the turning point in the struggle. * * *

"It 'threw South Carolina [wrote Clinton] into a state of confusion and rebellion.' It 'totally disheartened' the Tories, 'disconcerted Cornwallis's' plans, and made his position at Charleston untenable. Deserted by his friends and threatened by fresh swarms of enemies, Cornwallis thought no longer of conquest, but of flight, and on October 12, hastily abandoning Charlotte, fled 'with great precipitation' to Winnsboro, S. C. * * * Thus was the soil of North Carolina once more freed from the invader." (Conner, History of North Carolina, Vol. I, p. 474.)

GREENE IN NORTH CAROLINA

General Greene, when he took command of the American Army in the Carolinas, had but 2,300 men, half of them regulars, while Cornwallis had a larger force, all trained soldiers. Greene sent Morgan with 600 men to threaten the British in western South Carolina at Ninety-Six, and to encourage the Whigs, thus dividing his force. Cornwallis was between at Winnsboro, and sent Tarleton to drive off Morgan, but at Cowpens Morgan won, the survivors of the British force surrendering January 17, 1781.

Cornwallis, to avenge the defeat, marched against Morgan, who, on the afternoon of his victory, started to retire northward to make a junction with the force which Greene had ordered to retire from Cheraw. There resulted a race across North Carolina, the Americans trying to unite their divided forces, and Cornwallis endeavoring to attack and destroy Morgan before this could be accomplished. Greene, on his part would lure Cornwallis as far as possible from his base of supplies, and after uniting his forces, turn and destroy him. The American forces did unite at Guilford Courthouse, but Greene, not feeling strong enough for attack, continued his retreat until across the Dan River. However, after being reinforced by militia from North Carolina and Virginia, until he had about 4,400 men, he returned and attacked Cornwallis with 2,200 regulars at Guilford Courthouse.

Concerning this masterly retreat across North Carolina and its hardships Conner says (p. 479):

"Greene's management of this retreat entitles him to a place among the first soldiers of his age. * * * His personal participation in the dangers and hardships of the retreat was a constant inspiration to his men, whose suffering and heroic endurance equaled, if it did not surpass, that of Washington's men in the Trenton campaign. It was the depth of winter. The weather was wet and cold. The roads were knee-deep in mud and ice. Drenched with constant rain and sleet; often compelled to wade waist deep through foaming rivers; without tents, without blankets; pinched with hunger; half naked; marking the line of their march with the blood which flowed from their bare feet; constantly fighting rear-guard actions. Greene's men outmarched, outmaneuvered, and outfought their better-equipped adversaries, and when, after a continuous retreat of 22 days, they finally united forces with Huger at Guilford Courthouse, the British at Salem, 25 miles distant, were no nearer to them than they were on the day of Morgan's victory at Cowpens."

After Greene had placed an impassable river, the Dan, between himself and his enemy, he had not only saved his own army—

"He had led his enemy into a trap from which he could extricate himself only at great sacrifice, for Cornwallis was 230 miles from the base, in the enemy's country in dead of winter, without supplies, among timid friends, and with an ever-increasing hostile militia swarming in his rear. Greene's campaign elicited the highest praise from both enemy and friends. 'Every movement of the Americans during their march from the Catawba to Virginia,' wrote Tarleton, 'was judiciously designed and vigorously executed.' 'The rebels conducted their enterprises in Carolina,' declared Lord Germain, 'with more spirit and skill than they have shown in any other part of America.' 'Your retreat before Cornwallis,' wrote Washington, 'is highly applauded by all ranks.'" (Conner, History of North Carolina, Vol. I, pp. 479, 480.)

When Greene, with his reinforced army, struck at Guilford Courthouse on March 15, 1781, Cornwallis, by putting forth his best efforts in a desperate attack, caused the retirement of Greene with the loss of his artillery and 1,307 men, including 1,046 militia who dispersed to their homes. Greene retired to a strong position about 10 miles from the battle field to await his opponent's next move. Cornwallis, though nominally victorious, felt that his losses had been too heavy (532) to justify an offensive while his precarious position, far from his base, made it dangerous to simply hold the ground gained. He decided to retire to Wilmington, then in possession of a British force, where he could be protected by the British fleet. Therefore, on March 18, abandoning his wounded, he broke camp and retired to Cape Fear. Greene for a time followed, offering battle until he was assured of the destination of the British, then turned against the posts they held in the interior of South Carolina. Greene attacked the British at Eutaw Springs on September 8, but the British commander rallied his troops and drove the Americans from the field, though forced after the engagement to retire to Charleston. Meanwhile similar movements in Georgia had there driven the British into Savannah.

Thus Greene, by a series of movements in which he lost every battle but won every campaign, had wrenched Camden, Augusta, Ninety-Six, and all other interior posts, besides Georgetown, on the coast, from the grasp of the British. In all these campaigns the North Carolina troops took part.

"There were 248 North Carolina Militia at Hobkirk's hill and more than 200 of the new North Carolina Continentals at the siege of Augusta. At Eutaw Springs September 8 about half of Greene's army of 2,300 men were North Carolinians. A few were militia, the rest, brigaded under Gen. Jethro Sumner, were the 'Guilford Runaways,' now serving in the continental establishment. Discipline and training had turned them into excellent soldiers, and at Eutaw Springs they completely recovered the prestige which they had lost at Guilford Courthouse. The North Carolina Militia, forming the center of Greene's front line, after fighting gallantly, fell back before the charge of British Regulars. As they retired, Sumner's Continentals rushed forward in a charge which Greene himself declared 'would have graced the veterans of the great King of Prussia,' and restored the line. 'I was at a loss which to admire most,' said Greene, 'the gallantry of the officers or the good conduct of the men.' * * *

"After Eutaw there was no further serious fighting in either South Carolina or Georgia. The British then held only Charleston and Savannah, from which, without sea power, the Americans could not hope to drive them, but elsewhere throughout those two States the American governments were firmly reestablished." (Conner, History of North Carolina, Vol. I, pp. 485–486.)

On April 25, 1781, Cornwallis set out for Virginia, leaving Wilmington and marching through the eastern section of the State. North Carolina was finally freed from the armies of the King, though the struggle between loyalists and patriots continued locally, even after his surrender at Yorktown, October 19, 1781.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN

Mr. REID of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an address delivered by Dr. B. J. Cigrand, of Batavia, Ill. Doctor Cigrand has for years been pronounced by the press as an authority on Lincoln and the United States flag.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. REID of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include an address by Dr. B. J. Cigrand, of Batavia, Ill. Doctor Cigrand has for years been pronounced by the press as an authority on Lincoln and the United States flag. He is a scholar and lecturer, has been a member of the faculty of the University of Illinois for 32 years, and is the State commissioner of patriotism of the American Legion. One of his outstanding accomplishments was the organization of the American Flag Day Association, of which he was the first secretary and twice elected president. Thirty-five years ago he directed attention to the birthday of the flag—June 14, 1777—and by earnest, patriotic effort made it a national holiday, and is president of the National Flag Day Association, which induced President Woodrow Wilson to proclaim it an annual holiday.

This address was delivered at the Aurora Rotary Club celebration of Lincoln's birthday at the Union League Club, Aurora, on February 12, 1929. The subject was Lincoln Remained Unchanged. The address follows:

Few indeed are the world's leaders who have not changed radically their political, religious, and domestic careers. It is the exception and not the rule when they have maintained the ideals and enjoyments of their youth. When we study the biographies of the famed of the world we often find them, in their latter days championing—or advocating—what in their youth they opposed and showed intense antagonism for. Take as an example St. Paul, one of the greatest orators, and one of the most pronounced aides of Christianity, and you learn how when a young man he opposed and even resented at every opportunity the broad liberal views of Jesus Christ and with what severity he imprisoned and even tortured and killed Christians—yet calm reflection changed him and he became the most powerful convert in the history of Christianity.

Then, there was Constantine the Great, of Rome—with what vigor and enthusiasm he advocated paganism and later embraced with devotion the Christian creed. Oliver Cromwell when a lad was an intensified advocate of the reign by the royal family of England. The Bible reading and the contact with the working world led him eventually to be one of the greatest heroes in the battle of popular government. Others could be swung into this list of the Old World, including even the stern Napoleon of France.

But how of our own world and Nation? Well, there was Franklin, one-time king worshiper, then king hater. Washington, saturated in the aristocratic, regal atmosphere, yet against the wishes of his mother, he became one of the leaders of our Revolution. But primary and emphatic is the nature of Jefferson by his very blood and brain a real revolutionist—it compels opposition in his youth of the British idea of government. Antagonistic—and resentful—and finally the man who wrote the document that set us free.

But in Lincoln, whose memory grows brighter as time reflects his greatness founded on goodness—we get a new type of American. Born in the land of leadership, reared in a republic, nurtured in the forest, where the songs of freedom reign, he was completely satisfied with the form of government. The Constitution he learned was wisely formed. The basic structure, the Declaration of Independence, was most emphatic and correct; in fact, the land—its history, growth, and destiny—seemed a part of his career. In fact he may well be called our man of destiny.

MADE BY INFLUENCE

Recently one of Lincoln's biographers—who has written so many sides of Lincoln that no geometric figure represents its multitudinous planes—stated in a New York paper that Lincoln was made by environs—circumstances, local influences. A deep study of the life of this American will teach you that it was the blood that flowed in his veins—the impulse received from long line of ancestry that made him the giant among men. He had in him the spirit of the love of freedom and that quality of mind would assert itself no matter in what part of the country he lived—no matter what type of work had he had, no matter in what country he might have first seen the light of day.

Circumstances did a few—and but very few—things to make him great. Circumstances may have polished some of his way, given him a degree of culture and refinement—but the jeweler who polishes a diamond does not make the diamond. He could polish many a hard stone but it would not be a diamond—and so with Lincoln—he was a diamond in the rough, and circumstances only assisted in bringing out the luster. Lincoln was a great character and he did not suddenly—like another biographer recently published—become great just because a chance was given him to walk into the light of publicity. He was an eager student of men, books, and nations, and his greatness does not begin at any particular place or point—he was just an advocate of righteousness at all periods of his adult life—and his eventual greatness was only in keeping with his introduction to an evolution of tasks. It was just as hard for him to tell a man in his youth, "No thanks, I do not gamble," as later to reply, "No, I do not smoke," and the man who offered him the cigar, said, "If you don't smoke you never will amount to anything," and Lincoln replied, "I am of the same opinion."

HUMAN AND KIND

Don't let me lead you to think him faultless—or sinless—but let me picture him as human and of a particularly kind, helpful, and constructive turn of mind.

Let me quote Lincoln as to the topic of circumstances. In 1837 he heard Dr. Peter Akers give an address on the glorious Republic we live in and the speaker said: "Who can tell but that the man who shall lead us through this strife may be standing in this presence." And Lincoln, the boy of 23 years, remarked to a group of his friends: "Gentlemen, you may be surprised, and think it strange, but when the preacher was describing the war—I distinctly saw myself, as in second sight, bearing an important part in that strife." Nor is that the only time when impulse and inspiration begot the vision picture for Lincoln of future events. When he was a representative at the State capital he made an address in which he said, in part: "I never feel myself so fully rising to the complete exercise of the faculties which God has given me, as when I contemplate my country, assailed and in danger, and I, alone, standing between her and the perils that surround her."

Do not those words carry a prophecy and paint a picture that came to pass? And does that youth vision show that future circumstances might prepare him—or do the words indicate that he was always prepared? Lincoln was a fighter, a scrapper, an athlete in his tendencies—not seeking trouble—not looking for strife, but when it came, instantly before him—he like his own, his real, his actual father Thomas Lincoln—they could tell it in words—with grappling fingers—with clinched fists and with cowhide boots. They were persons, father and son, who could tell a story, narrate a tale, and if need lick the bully of the community.

His liberty of spirit was inborn with him—though his Catholic, Methodist, Baptist, and Congregationalist teachers helped to polish up the stone. He, like Christ, made circumstances.

It is no wonder the world loves Lincoln—he loved the world and reflected the glory of an unselfish idealism—exemplified in the pages of a book we call the Bible, the substructure of our Republic, and Lincoln was not only familiar with that great book but he applied its philosophy and lived it—in a most exemplary way—and no man in the history of the world, since the days of Christ—so cheerfully and emphatically accepted all men as deserving—equality before the golden rule—as did this same greatly revered Lincoln—master of men, and servant of mankind.

To-day when the magazines and many books are filled with detracting articles pertaining to American leadership, and when many poorly informed scripters are pronouncing Lincoln a form of lucky politician, it behooves us on his birthday to take invoice on facts. Besides the statements are made that he was far from being a statesman, but that those whom he had about him and whom he had wisely selected—they and not Lincoln were the real statesmen; and that they and not he were in control during the soul-trying period of the Civil War. And that instead of him being the leader of his Cabinet, he just congenially followed in the route, set by these members of the Cabinet. Let us see if such is the case. Recently disclosed memoranda from the Nicolay papers show that at one time there was considerable unrest in the Cabinet, that several members, among them Seward and Stanton, were suggesting removals of some of the comembers of the Cabinet. The public was quite generally informed of the situation and the press editorialized about the affair. Then Lincoln, always slow to disturb affairs, decided he would put an end to the squabbling and he prepared a notice for the entire Cabinet. When it again assembled he handed the following to Seward with instructions: "When you have read this, hand it to the next member, and when all of you have read it, let the sheet come back to me," and here is the notice:

"I myself must be the judge how long to retain in, and when to remove any of you from his position. It would greatly pain me to discover any of you endeavoring to procure another's removal, or in any way to prejudice him before the public. Such endeavor would be a wrong to me; and much more, a wrong to the country. My wish is that on this subject, no remark be made, nor question asked, by any of you, here or elsewhere, now or hereafter."

CONTROLLED CABINET

That shows quite conclusively who was the schoolmaster. I could illustrate the point with scores of similar items to show that Lincoln not only controlled but directed his Cabinet, and as a commanding personality he, like all truly great men, kept himself slightly in reserve. No big giant mind tries to dictate. All famed leaders are reluctant about using all their power; they refrain from employing all their strength and are always timid about displaying their supreme command of a situation. It's only the little man who desires to impress the thought of his superiority.

Did not Lincoln manifest a great wisdom when the sons of Gen. R. E. Lee were captured and when all the leaders suggested they be not only held as prisoners but some even said, "Shoot them at sunrise"? Lincoln, with a Bible in his hand, called to see Stanton, severe military man, and who enforced war discipline. Lincoln said, "This book teaches mercy. I have come to tell you to send a wire stating, 'Release the sons of Robert E. Lee and restore them to their father.'" Here we have a double point in Lincoln's favor. It shows who was master, and it tells again in fondest terms that he would not use his entire power.

Though Lincoln was not always so mild, and at no time in all his writings do I find him setting aside the merciful as July 30, 1863, when he actually avowed the Mosaic law, "a tooth for a tooth and an eye for an eye." He practically told the South if you enslave any more of our captured men, we will enslave such of yours as we captured; if you kill any of our men in prison, we will kill such of yours as we hold captive. This, I believe, is the severest example in the career of Lincoln. He was driven to distraction, and I have a copy of that entire message in my possession.

HAD MILLIONS OF FOLLOWERS

There are many who overdo the laudation to Lincoln by saying he stood alone in the great Civil War. That is only fractionally true and applies to all leadership. The head must take the brunt. But he was not alone. He had millions of loyal hearts with him and hundreds of thousands of men were willing to offer up their lives that our country might receive salvation. No; Lincoln did not stand alone. Nor did Lindbergh fly across the Atlantic alone. Both had with them the lessons of our land. They could see Valley Forge; they visioned the fortitude, faith, and courage of Franklin, Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe. They had with them millions of inspiring memories, and they, too, had strength when hearts grow weak and minds act sluggish and eyes become dimmed by doubt and fear.

No man, no woman, no child stands alone when engaged in noble work. Friends, seen and unseen, lead us on by a smile, prayer, and thought, I do not share in the lines of Ella Wilcox, "Laugh and the world laughs with you; weep and you weep alone." You never in all your life really shed tears about a real disappointment, but what some other heart beat quicker. You never lay your head on the pillow, restless and stricken, but what some other mind, conscious of your grief, sobbed and hoped you be relieved. I am one who believes all this world is closely tied in a silvery chain of memories, and as Americans we surely are one in thought and action, for the principles so splendidly exemplified by our own idealist and leader, Abraham Lincoln.

HON. JAMES J. DAVIS, SECRETARY OF LABOR

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on Mr. James J. Davis.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, James J. Davis has been Secretary of Labor for eight years. During his incumbency in office it was my good fortune to become very closely associated with him. As a member of the Immigration Committee I had quite a deal of official contact with him and it was often necessary for me to importune Mr. Davis for considerate treatment. His courtesy is proverbial, his patience is unlimited, and his good humor never fails him. Every one of us who had occasion to come into contact with him is full of praises and happy beyond words to have dealings with this splendid public official.

Now that Mr. Davis's incumbency is coming to an end, let me use this opportunity to thank him for the wonderful manner in which he made me appreciate the great work of his department, the efficiency of his subordinates, and the spirit of helpful cooperation which you find on all sides when dealing with the Department of Labor.

Mr. Davis is a Republican, while I am a Democrat. During the years of Mr. Davis's incumbency my party was in the minority in the House of Representatives, but while in the minority in the House and while our party did not have a member representing it in the Cabinet during the eight years just past, I do not believe that any public official selected from my party could have discharged the duties of the office as Secretary of Labor in a more fitting, more industrious, and more intelligent manner than James J. Davis.

The administration of his department was a model and will forever remain a model for his successors in office, both in the efficiency and management of the tasks which were to be performed by him, as well as of any work which was to be done by his subordinates.

As I am saying these words, word comes to us that Mr. Davis will be continued in the new administration as Secretary of Labor. This is mighty good news for me and mighty good news for the public. Mr. Davis should be continued as long as he himself desires to conduct the great office to which he was first called by the late President Harding.

I only regret that we have far too few public officials of the type of Mr. Davis. Like Abou Ben Adhem, we can only wish that his "tribe may increase."

OREGON SECURES NOMINATION OF LINCOLN

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, the importance of preserving historical data relating to our country can not be appraised too highly. Especially is this true if the data concerned touches the lives of our outstanding statesmen and heroes or the history of political procedure. Under the privilege granted by the House to extend my remarks, I am therefore submitting the following from the pen of one of our distinguished citizens, Judge Austin Mires, of Ellensburg, Wash.:

JESSE APPLEGATE, OF UMPQUA VALLEY, OREGON, AND THE PART HE PLAYED IN THE FIRST NOMINATION OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN—A BIT OF UNWRITTEN HISTORY

By Judge Austin Mires

The name Umpqua is applied to that section of southern Oregon lying between the Calipooia Mountains on the north and Cow Creek Mountain on the south, the Cascades on the east, and the Coast Range Mountains on the west, embracing all the territory drained by the Umpqua River and its numerous tributaries.

Well to the northern part of Umpqua Valley, surrounded by oak-clad hills, lies the beautiful valley of Yoncalla.

To this locality in the year 1849 came that chief of Oregon pioneers, Jesse Applegate, who settled on land as a homestead a short distance north of the present town of Yoncalla, which spot was thenceforth his permanent home.

In his early days Applegate had received important assistance from Edward Bates, of Missouri, whom he ever held in highest esteem. He named one of his boys Edward Bates Applegate, who when 14 years of age was capsized and drowned in the rapids of the Columbia River on the downward journey of a part of the Oregon emigration of 1843, and he kept up a regular correspondence with Mr. Bates from his Oregon home and after Bates became Attorney General in the Cabinet of Abraham Lincoln. Jesse Applegate is too well known and remembered by Oregonians as well as everyone who has any acquaintance with early Oregon history to require any effort to show his influence over affairs in this new land or to prove the integrity of his character or the fullness of his gratitude.

In the year 1860 Edward Bates was a prominent Republican and a candidate for the nomination for President of the United States. It is needless to say Jesse Applegate was an ardent supporter of the candidacy of his old Missouri benefactor.

Leander Holmes had been the nominee of the Republican Party of Oregon for secretary of state in 1858. At the Republican State convention held April 21, 1859, he, along with Dr. W. Warren and A. G. Hovey, were chosen delegates to the Republican National Convention for 1860 and were instructed to use their influence for William H. Seward for nomination for President. It was claimed that these Seward resolutions were slipped over on the convention by B. J. Pengra, editor of the Peoples Press, of Eugene, Oreg., after the convention had made arrangements to adjourn and half the members had left, supposing there was nothing more to be done. At all events the Republican State convention, which met April 19, 1860, readopted the platform of the preceding convention with the omission of the Seward resolutions.

It is a well-known fact that Horace Greeley, through his paper, the New York Tribune, in the days of which we write, exercised a greater influence throughout the country north of the Mason and Dixon line than any other man or set of men. His paper found its way to almost every fireside, and with the great majority of the voting population, especially the farming element, it was the highest political authority.

Some years prior to 1859 Greeley had broken loose from W. H. Seward and Thurlow Weed, his erstwhile political colleagues, and was at this time opposed to Mr. Seward for the Presidency. On account of this opposition he was kept off the New York delegation to the Chicago convention, which delegation was solid for Seward.

Jesse Applegate and Leander Holmes were fast friends, and when it was discovered that Holmes could not attend the national convention Applegate persuaded him to send his proxy to Horace Greeley, whom he adored, with instructions to use it in the interest of Edward Bates.

It is said the New York delegation had no intention that Greeley was to have a voice in the convention until the roll call of States. When Oregon was reached in the call, Mr. Greeley stood up and responded as one of its delegates. At this turn of affairs consternation showed in the faces of the New Yorkers. They knew Greeley was in position to wage a fight against their candidate that had not been dreamed of, let alone counted on, and among them were heard some genuine swearing and strong epithets. They chaffed and bantered him, calling out, among other things: "When did you move?" "Go west—go west and stay there."

Greeley was given a place on the committee on platform and resolutions, and he wielded a greater influence in that convention than any other man.

On the first and second ballots the Oregon vote went to Edward Bates. As between Lincoln and Seward, the leading candidates, the vote stood: First ballot, Seward 173½, Lincoln 102; second ballot, Seward 184½, Lincoln 181. There were 465 votes in the convention, with 233 necessary for a choice. It is reported that "During the third ballot there was tolerable order until Oregon declared for Lincoln, rendering his nomination certain. At this point the enthusiasm became irrepressible; the wigwam was shaken with cheers from 23,000 Republicans." Truth to say, the Oregon vote did not render Lincoln's nomination absolutely certain, but it brought his vote up to 231½, within 1½ votes of nomination, and before the vote was announced other States changed to Lincoln, and no further ballot was taken.

Through the influence of Mr. Greeley the Oregon vote was first cast for Edward Bates and finally for Abraham Lincoln. It might be well to here state that Oregon had 6 votes in the Chicago convention. The State convention in 1859 had chosen the three already mentioned and had constituted a Republican central committee composed of Henry W. Corbett, afterwards United States Senator, W. Cary Johnson, and E. D. Shattuck. When it was discovered that Oregon had been assigned six delegates instead of three this central committee appointed three additional delegates in the persons of H. W. Corbett, Franklin Johnson, and Joel Burlingame, who resided at the time at the little town of Scio, in Linn County, Oreg. He was the father of Anson Burlingame, the distinguished Representative in Congress from Massachusetts in 1856.

It has all along been conceded that Horace Greeley brought about the first nomination of Abraham Lincoln. His nomination was rendered certain by the defeat of W. H. Seward. Mr. Seward himself, in his autobiography, lays his defeat to Greeley. But Mr. Greeley could never have achieved this had he not been a member of that memorable convention. His place in that convention was owing to no other than Jesse Applegate, who induced Leander Holmes to send him his proxy.

I know of but one man now living who knew how Horace Greeley happened to get a proxy from Oregon to the Chicago convention of May, 1860, and that man is Hon. Binger Hermann, of Roseburg, Oreg., who was 83 years old on the 19th day of February, 1926, and died April 15, 1926. He came to Oregon from Maryland in 1859 and in 1862 taught school in the Applegate district, which school was attended by several of Jesse Applegate's children, and he lived for some time in the Applegate home. He was assisted in numerous ways by Mr. Applegate in the days of his young manhood, and knew him intimately and loved him well. He was elected to Congress from the State of Oregon in 1884, and represented the State in that capacity, all together, 16 years, and was for 4 years Commissioner of the General Land Office. He has always taken a lively interest in the political affairs of his country and knows a wonderful lot of Oregon history.

Just a little way south of Drain, Oreg., the Pacific Highway passes through the old homestead of Jesse Applegate. Less than a quarter of a mile from where the old dwelling house of Mr. Applegate stood, up on the spur of the hill, is a little cemetery; and here the "Sage of Yoncalla" and his good wife, Cynthia, sleep side by side. The spot is marked by a humble sandstone slab or monument, 2½ feet by 20 inches by 6 inches in dimensions, facing north and south. The stone was fashioned by Mr. Applegate himself, assisted by his son, Peter Skeen Applegate, who did the graving; and was placed there at the time of his wife's death some seven years before the death of Mr. Applegate. The south side, or face, now bears the following inscription: "Jesse Applegate Bn–7–31–1811 Dd 4–22–1888." The north face "Cynthia Applegate Bn 8–13–1813 Dd 6–1–1881."

This little monument is of soft substance and is fast crumbling away, and ere long there will remain nothing in the material world to show the stranger where rest entombed the ashes of the greatest of all Oregon pioneers, that stalwart Republican who, from these precincts, this part of old Umpqua in that elder day sent forth an influence that gave direction to the destiny of the American Republic.

ARMY PROMOTION

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the subject of Army promotions.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, no Member of Congress will dispute the fact that present conditions affecting promotion and retirement in the Army are most unsatisfactory, breeding discontent that will inevitably impair the efficiency of our national defense.

Promotion is in a state of stagnation, due principally to the fact that there are about 5,000 officers of approximately the same age who started their commissioned service in the Army within a period of two years. Under existing laws, as interpreted, the promotion of this group of officers, comprising what is generally referred to as the "hump," as well as the promotion of the officers who come behind them, will be discouragingly slow and marked with inequities that would seem to demand immediate attention. When the senior officer in the "hump" is a colonel, it has been pointed out, the junior will be facing the dismal prospect of remaining a captain for a number of years.

Both in the Senate and in the House members of the Military Affairs Committee have given freely of time and effort to bring forth legislation designed to accelerate promotion, correct outstanding injustices, and provide for an orderly flow of advancement in the future. It is to be regretted that the apparent conference impasse, arising out of an honest divergence of opinion as to the best methods of solving this perplexing problem, brings despair to the officers of the Army and those who had hoped to see a solution, as fair and as complete as might humanly be expected, arrived at during this session.

Those who will give their further attention to this important matter will be interested in the final results of the survey conducted by the Army and Navy Journal. Efforts were made to contact every promotion-list officer, and the final tabulation gives the individual opinion of more than 60 per cent of the officers who will be affected by pending legislation.

Mr. Bertram Kalisch, managing editor of this service paper, has advised me that 6,000 officers returned cards setting out their views on basic promotion principles, and the response gives the ratio of practically 10 to 1 in favor of promotion based upon length of service, many indicating that the adoption of this basic principle in any legislation enacted would go far toward remedying the current stagnation.

There were 203 cards returned which are indicated as nontabular. Sixty-eight were from general officers, whose comments are worthy of note in view of the fact that these officers would not be affected by any clause except the removal of retirement restrictions. The remaining 135 nontabular replies were solely written expressions indicating that the officer was for or against certain pending bills or problems. Thirty-three were for revision, with no other comment; 75 were against revision. Ten expressed themselves as being in favor of the Black bill, 10 for the Reed bill, and 7 for the Furlow Air Corps bill. The general summary cards also contained comments on these measures, 99 indorsing the Reed measure and 48 favoring the Black-McSwain bill.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I send to the desk a short article from the Charleston (S. C.) News and Courier, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

There being no objection, the article was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the News and Courier, Charleston, S. C., Thursday morning, February 28, 1929]

HOLDS COMPANY NOT RESPONSIBLE—JUDGE RULES FOR PLAINTIFF IN OFFSHOOT OF BEAUFORT BANK FAILURE

Another echo from the Beaufort bank failure was heard in eastern district United States court yesterday, when Judge Ernest F. Cochran held in an opinion that the Truckers' Supply Co., which went under with the bank, is not liable for notes which it indorsed. The notes were made worthless by the subsequent failure of the Beaufort bank.

The company was not authorized to indorse the notes, the court holds, and therefore the doctrine of ultra vires (beyond its power) holds good to nullify their validity. The case is brought by William J. Thomas, trustee in bankruptcy for the Truckers' Supply Co., against the Federal intermediate credit bank, which sought to collect on the notes and the mortgage which the company gave as security.

According to the Federal intermediate credit bank, the Truckers' Supply Co. reaped benefits from indorsing the notes of farmers, because the farmers would then buy supplies from the company. The court sustained the report of the special master, however, who held that there was no way of showing such benefits, and that, even so, the company's charter did not give the power to indorse such notes.

Whereas conditions appear now to be favorable to the conclusion of a treaty with Canada and the enactment of the necessary legislation to make this project a reality: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That this legislature hereby again expresses the great interest of the people of the State of Wisconsin in the early completion of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway project and respectfully memorializes the President of the United States to conclude a treaty with Canada upon this waterway, and the Senate to promptly ratify such a treaty, if submitted, and the Congress to pass necessary legislation to give effect thereto; be it further Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, to the presiding officers of both Houses of the Congress of the United States, and to each Wisconsin Member thereof.

HENRY A. HUBER,
President of the Senate.
O. G. MUNSON,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.
CHAS. B. PERRY,
Speaker of the Assembly.
C. E. SHAFFER,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration:

STATE OF WISCONSIN.

Senate Joint Resolution 49, relating to the national-origins clause of the Federal immigration act of 1924

Whereas the immigration act of 1924 included a provision known as the "national-origins clause," under which the number of immigrants admitted to the United States from the several European countries was to be determined by the relative number of descendants of people born in these several countries in the population of the United States; and

Whereas the commission, consisting of the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor, which was created by the immigration act of 1924 to work out the quotas allowed to each country under the national-origins clause, has reported that there is no reliable basis for determining national origins and that this clause of the immigration law is arbitrary, uncertain, and unjust; and

Whereas President-elect Hoover, who, as Secretary of Commerce, served as a member of the commission to work out the quotas under the national-origins clause, in his campaign for President advocated the repeal of this clause; and

Whereas Congress has twice postponed the taking effect of the national-origins clause, due to its unfairness and uncertainty; and

Whereas, despite the practically unanimous disapproval of the national-origins clause by officials charged with its administration, this clause will come into effect on July 1, 1929, unless the present Congress before its adjournment will pass the Nye resolution, or some similar measure, postponing the date of the taking effect of this provision: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That the Legislature of Wisconsin hereby respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to promptly enact legislation either repealing the national-origins clause of the immigration act of 1924 or indefinitely postponing the time of its taking effect; be it further

Resolved, That duly attested copies of this resolution be sent to the presiding officers of both Houses of Congress and to each Wisconsin Member thereof.

President of the Senate.
O. G. MUNSON,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.
CHAS. B. PERRY,

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Montana, praying for the passage of legislation permitting the owners of land in the Upper Milk River irrigation districts to enter into contracts permitting payments for the St. Marys diversion charges to be made in 40 years, and to allow deduction of nonproductive land, which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

(See identical memorial printed in full when presented today by Mr. WALSH of Montana.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate joint memorials of the Legislature of the State of Montana, praying for the passage of necessary legislation to protect the beet-sugar and livestock industries, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

(See identical memorials printed in full when presented today by Mr. WALSH of Montana.)

Mr. WALSH of Montana presented the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Montana, which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation:

Senate Joint Memorial 1, to the Congress of the United States, to enact such legislation as will permit the owners of land in the upper Milk River irrigation districts to enter into contracts permitting payments for the St. Marys diversion charges, to be made in 40 years, and to allow deduction of nonproductive land

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States of America:

Your memorialists, the members of the Twenty-first Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, the Senate and House concurring, respectfully represent that—

Whereas the honorable Secretary of the Interior has advised the several irrigation districts in the upper Milk River Valley, in Montana, that unless they sign a contract agreeing to pay for the St. Marys diversion and storage charges in 20 years at $15 per acre they will not be permitted to use the waters from the St. Marys storage system during the year 1929; and

Whereas the said landowners in the upper Milk River Valley originally held valuable priority rights to the waters of the Milk River, while landowners in the lower Milk River Valley had no such rights; and

Whereas as a part of the inducement to encourage the diversion of such St. Marys River into the Milk River, the said upper valley landowners consented to waive their priority water rights, when the St. Marys water should be turned in, and assume an equal responsibility with lower Milk River landowners for payment of charges for the St. Marys diversion works; and

Whereas by an act of Congress, approved May 25, 1926, known as the "adjustment act," 39,900 acres of land were relieved of payment for storage and diversion charges by reason of temporary nonproductivity of the soil, and 1,770 acres more were relieved of storage and diversion charges by reason of permanent nonproductivity of the soil; and

Whereas in conformity with the provisions of said act of Congress, irrigation districts in the lower Milk River unit have been permitted to enter into contracts with the honorable Secretary of the Interior, relieving them from payments on 29,930 acres, as temporarily nonproductive, and 1,770 acres as permanently nonproductive, and providing for payment of storage and diversion charges during a period of 40 years; and

Whereas by proposed contracts of the Department of the Interior, irrigation districts in the upper Milk River unit are denied deductions of nonproductive land amounting to 3,000 acres, allowed by said act of Congress, and are required to make payment in 20 years: Be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of this Twenty-first Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana that the Congress of the United States enact such legislation as will permit the irrigation districts in the upper Milk River unit to enter into contracts on equal terms of payment with those permitted in the lower Milk River districts, and provide therein for a deduction of 3,000 acres of nonproductive land as allowed by act of Congress; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be forwarded to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, Secretary of the Interior, and to each of the Senators and Representatives of the State of Montana in Congress.

Approved by J. E. Erickson, governor, February 12, 1929.

Mr. WALSH of Montana also presented the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Montana, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

House Joint Resolution 2, expressing the desire of the people of the State of Montana to the Congress of the United States of America that they take into further consideration the resolutions heretofore introduced in both bodies of Congress relating to an amendment to the Constitution respecting the time at which the President and Vice President and Members of Congress shall assume their official duties

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Montana (the Senate concurring), That we respectfully urge that Congress pass legislation for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing that the President, Vice President, and Members of Congress shall take office the January following their election; be it further

Resolved, That we do most earnestly urge upon the Senators and Representatives in the Congress from the State of Montana that they cooperate in suitable legislation to carry out the intent of this resolution; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Montana.

Approved by J. E. Erickson, governor, February 18, 1929.

Mr. WALSH of Montana also presented the following joint memorials of the Legislature of the State of Montana, which were referred to the Committee on Finance:

House Joint Memorial 1, to the Congress of the United States, requesting the enactment of such legislation as may be necessary to protect the beet-sugar industry

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

Your memorialists, the members of the Twenty-first Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana (the House and the Senate concurring), respectfully represent:

Whereas it appears that the Congress of the United States will in the near future enact a tariff law; and

Whereas the schedules of said law may have a vital effect upon the agriculture industry of the State of Montana, and particularly upon the raising of sugar beets in this State; and

Whereas the growing of sugar beets and the production of sugar is now an important industry in the State of Montana, and it appears that said industry will become of increasing importance in the future; and

Whereas by reason of the large importation of sugar from points outside of continental United States of America, which sugar has in the past come in free of duty, or at excessively low-tariff rates, the very life of the domestic beet-sugar industry is threatened; and

Whereas the loss of such industry or the impoverishment thereof would be harmful and dangerous to the business life of this State: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of your memorialists, the Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, that the Congress of the United States should by proper legislation adequately protect our beet-sugar industry from foreign importations to an extent at least sufficient to equalize the cost of production at home and abroad; and to limit the free entry of sugar from wheresoever it may come, to the end that such sugar may not be in competition in the domestic market with that portion of the total consumption of sugar in the United States, which can be supplied by domestic production; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial, duly authenticated, be sent to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States and to each of the Senators and Representatives of Montana in Congress.

Approved by J. E. Erickson, governor, February 9, 1929.

House Joint Memorial 2, to the Congress of the United States, requesting the enactment of such legislation as may be necessary to protect the livestock industry

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

Your memorialists, the members of the Twenty-first Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana (the house and the senate concurring), respectfully represent:

Whereas it appears that the Congress of the United States will in the near future enact a tariff law; and

Whereas the schedules of said law may have a vital effect upon the livestock industry of the State of Montana; and

Whereas the policy of this country and of the present administration is one of protection to native industries; and

Whereas alone among important raw materials cattle hides remain on the free list; and

Whereas the importation of beef products, particularly of canned beef, has increased and is still increasing in volume; and

Whereas the beef growers of the United States are entitled to the advantage of a tariff, so called, that it will effectually diminish the volume of such imports; and

Whereas such imports originate in countries where the cost of production of livestock is materially less than in the United States; and

Whereas the sheep growers of this State are now receiving the benefits afforded by a protective tariff on wool and lambs; and

Whereas such tariff protection is absolutely necessary to the development and success of the sheep-growing industry: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of your memorialists, the Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, that the Congress of the United States should by proper legislation adequately protect the interests of the livestock industry by placing a duty on hides and by maintaining the present tariff on wool, and especially by increasing the tariff on beef and lamb; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial, duly authenticated, be sent to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States and to each of the Senators and Representatives of Montana, and Senator KENDRICK, of Wyoming, in Congress.

Approved by J. E. Erickson, governor, February 13, 1929.

Mr. WHEELER presented four joint memorials of the Legislature of the State of Montana identical to those just above presented and printed in full, which were referred to their appropriate committees, as above indicated.

Mr. WATSON presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Indiana, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

STATE OF INDIANA,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

Joint resolution concerning a system of inland waterways, including the Wabash River, and urging Congress to enact appropriate legislation to secure the establishment of such a system

Whereas Representative NOBLE J. JOHNSON, of the fifth congressional district of Indiana, has introduced two bills in Congress, designated, respectively, as H. R. 9034 and H. R. 9309, authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to make an examination and survey of the Wabash River, flowing through the State of Indiana and between the State of Indiana and the State of Illinois, for the purpose of widening and deepening the channel of the Wabash River, for purpose of navigation, and the construction of the necessary canals, dams, and reservoirs to constitute a continuous waterway through the State, and maintain an adequate flood of water therein for the purpose of navigation, and for the control of the floods of the Wabash River in accordance with the provisions of section 3 of the flood control act approved March 1, 1917; and

Whereas the enactment of these bills into law will be of paramount consequence and importance to the citizens of the State of Indiana and of widespread and lasting economic benefit generally; and

Whereas it is the sense of the General Assembly of the State of Indiana that every encouragement should be given to the establishment and construction of a comprehensive system of inland waterways: Therefore be it

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Indiana:

SECTION 1. That the General Assembly of the State of Indiana hereby approves of the establishment, construction, and operations of a comprehensive system of inland waterways; and that the Wabash River should be included in and made a component and integrated part of the system of waterways so established and constructed. The General Assembly of the State of Indiana hereby approves of the general purport of the bills introduced in Congress by Representative NOBLE J. JOHNSON providing for a survey of the Wabash River, and hereby urges and instructs the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State to strive by all honorable means to secure the passage of these bills as introduced, or in such amended form as the Congress, in its discretion, may deem to be most suitable.

SEC. 2. The secretary of the state is hereby directed to forward a certified copy of this resolution to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Indiana and likewise to forward a certified copy to the Speaker of the National House of Representatives and the President of the United States Senate.

JAMES M. KNAPP,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
EDGAR D. BOUH,
President of the Senate.

Approved, January 13, 1929.

HARRY G. LESLIE,
Governor of the State of Indiana.

Mr. SCHALL. For my colleague [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] and myself we present four memorials of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota: One in favor of a 9-foot channel on the upper Mississippi River, another in favor of retaining the principle of the flexible tariff, another to amend section 5219 of the Revised Statutes, and another for the relief of Lake of the Woods citizens who have been damaged by overflow on their property.

The memorials were referred as follows:

To the Committee on Commerce:

Concurrent resolution memoralizing the President of the United States, the Secretary of War, and the Congress of the United States to urge the establishment of a 9-foot channel on the upper Mississippi River

Whereas Maj. C. L. Hall, district United States engineer at Rock Island, has overridden the protests of the Mississippi Valley Shippers Association and of shippers generally throughout the Northwest, and has recommended to the Secretary of War in opposition to the establishment of a 9-foot channel on the upper Mississippi River; and

Whereas the establishment of a shallower channel for barge traffic will not adequately care for the vast amount of shipping which awaits the improvement and development of river transportation; and

Whereas the Secretary of War, or Gen. Edgar Jadwin, Chief of Army Engineers, and as last resort the Congress of the United States, has the power and authority to reject Major Hall's report and establish a 9-foot channel; and

Whereas the United States Senate has approved a $10,000,000 river-equipment appropriation for the Federal barge line system, with which $4,000,000 worth of barge equipment on the upper Mississippi will be purchased this year, and which equipment must necessarily be adapted to the type of channel which the Government will provide or will in the future be rendered obsolete because of changes in that channel; and

Whereas a trade outlet to tidewater has been claimed and recognized as an economic right by all nations, and the inland empire of land-locked States in the Mississippi Valley, greater in area, in population, and in resources than a dozen European nations, is still deprived of access to the sea. Though restrained from independent action by the Federal pact, these States have not lost or waived their economic rights; the duty to secure them has merely been transferred to the Federal Government, and they must look to that agency for redress; and

Whereas the operation of the Panama Canal, coupled with increased rail rates, has moved the Mid West economically farther from the seaboard and has not only placed a handicap on its outbound products but has added to the costs of inbound supplies. The Mid West has, therefore, a special right to demand that its balanced trade relations destroyed by governmental action be speedily restored, and that the benefits of the Panama Canal be extended to all those who were assessed for its cost. The duty to correct these distorted conditions rests with the Government responsible for their creation; and

Whereas agriculture is the basic industry of the Mid West, and transportation burdens bear most heavily on that industry because the farmer has no control over his selling prices. He can not add the freight to his costs and pass it to the consumer; he stands at the end of the line and pays the freight both ways: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Minnesota (the House concurring), That the State of Minnesota does hereby urge the President of the United States, the Secretary of War, and the Congress of the United States to provide a 9-foot channel adequate to care for commercial river navigation on the upper Mississippi; be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state of Minnesota be instructed to send a copy of this resolution to the President of the United States, the Secretary of War, and to each Member of Congress of Minnesota, and to those elected whose term begins after the close of the present short session.

To the Committee on Finance:

Concurrent resolution memorializing the President of the United States and the Congress of the United States that it is the sense of the members of the Minnesota Legislature that we favor the retention of the principle of the flexible tariff law

Whereas the administration of tariff laws requires close and intelligent supervision; and

Whereas tariff schedules can not be drawn which will continually represent the fair and reasonable relationship between various commodities or between the production cost of the same commodity in this country as compared with its production cost in countries which are importers or prospective importers; and

Whereas such relationship can be maintained by the wise and honest administration of a flexible tariff: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Minnesota (the Senate concurring), That we favor the continuance of the principle of the flexible tariff law; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state of Minnesota be instructed to send copies of this resolution to the President of the United States, the Members in Congress from the State of Minnesota, and to the President-elect Herbert Hoover.

To the Committee on the Judiciary:

Joint resolution memorializing Congress to amend section 5219, Revised Statutes of the United States, so as to permit the taxation of shares of national banks upon a fair and equitable basis

Whereas the several States of the Union are prohibited from taxing the personal property of national banks, and may tax their shares only as permitted by Congress under the provisions of section 5219 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which, in effect, permits the taxation of such shares only at a rate not higher than the tax imposed upon money owned by individuals and by them invested in mortgages, bonds, and other securities (commonly known as money and credits) in which national banks may invest their funds; and

Whereas it is unfair to tax an individual so using his own funds at as high a rate as bank shares which derive the benefit of the investment returns of from seven to ten times their own amount in the form of deposits; and

Whereas every attempt at taxation of money and credits at more than a relatively nominal rate has always proved a failure, and the practice of taxing them at low rates has in each of the many States employing that method resulted in reaching enormously greater amounts of such property and in producing a larger revenue and in the better distribution and equalizing of the burden of maintaining government; and

Whereas the courts have held invalid taxes levied on bank shares in States that undertake to tax money and credits at the same rate as bank shares on the ground that a substantial part of such money and credits are not, and by reason of the failure of owners to declare them for taxation at a relatively high rate can not be taxed at all; and

Whereas the schemes contained in section 5219 of taxing bank shares by income or excise rather than by value are neither practicable nor adaptable to States raising their revenue by the ad valorem method of taxation, which method has always been and now is in use by substantially all of the States in the Union; and

Whereas the American Bankers' Association and the association of bankers in various States, entrenched behind the wall raised about them by this act of Congress, have declared that they do not trust State legislatures to tax them, have united in exerting every effort in opposition to relief to the States by the necessary amendment of that section, and have demanded that the States abandon their present well-tried and satisfactory methods of taxation and substitute an income or excise tax, the result of which has been to reduce the tax on bank shares by more than one-half in every one of the three States in which it has been adopted, with the consequent increase of the burden to be borne by other taxpayers; and

Whereas there is no organization corresponding to the bankers' associations to protect the interests of the general taxpaying public in the 40 States whose present methods of taxing bank shares are now found to be unworkable and invalid under section 5219; and

Whereas the deplorable situation in which these States find themselves, faced as they are with the choice of radically altering their present taxation systems in compliance with the wishes of the bankers or of virtually exempting banks from taxation, demands immediate action in the amendment of section 5219 so as to permit the taxation of national banks on a basis that is fair and equitable to themselves and to the general taxpaying public: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Minnesota (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress of the United States be, and the same hereby is, urgently petitioned and requested to amend section 5219, Revised Statutes of the United States, so as to permit the taxation of the shares of national banks upon a fair and equitable basis, as contemplated by bills now pending before the Senate and the House of Representatives of Congress and amendments proposed thereto.

To the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Joint resolution memorializing the President, the President elect, and the Congress of the United States for the relief of the Lake of the Woods settlers for past damages suffered at the hands of power corporations and enterprises in Canada, in accordance with the convention between the United States and Great Britain to regulate the level of the Lake of the Woods, by providing that the settlers may have their claims heard and tried in the courts of the land

Whereas the Norman Dam, located at the outlet of the Lake of the Woods at Kenora, in the Province of Ontario, Dominion of Canada, has been so regulated by the power companies under the authority of the Government of the Dominion of Canada as to flood the lands and property of the American settlers living upon the Minnesota shore of the Lake of the Woods; and

Whereas the residents of the Lake of the Woods area have for many years protested by petitions, letters, and resolutions to their Senators and Congressmen, and to the Department of State of the United States of America against the maintenance of the Lake of the Woods above its natural level; and

Whereas these protests were uniformly referred to the War Department for investigation and report, and the reports made by the engineers of that department have conveyed to the authorities and the representatives of the United States the erroneous impression that the dam in question has not interfered with lake levels; and consequently the Government of the United States, relying upon such reports prior to the investigation by the International Joint Commission hereinafter mentioned, and believing that the complaints of the settlers were unfounded, for many years took no action to relieve the settlers or to compensate them for their damages; and

Whereas a joint investigation made by the United States and the Dominion of Canada through the agency of the International Joint Commission and independently of the engineers of the War Department, disclosed that the dam had in fact raised the waters of Lake of the Woods by from 4 to 6 feet above their natural level, and following such investigation a treaty was entered into between the two Governments looking to the acquisition by condemnation proceedings of a flowage easement upon the littoral lands so as to provide a regulated flow for the development of an enormously high amount of hydroelectric power out of the waters of the Lake of the Woods at sites in the Winnipeg River and elsewhere in Canada, and providing also for the payment to the settlers of the damages suffered by them in the past; and

Whereas under the act of Congress passed pursuant to that treaty the War Department and its engineers have been required to ascertain, and authorized to fix, the amount of such past damages, and in so doing have taken the position that in the ascertainment of such damages the settlers must be bound by the earlier inadequate and erroneous reports made to the War Department, and hence be treated as trespassers upon, rather than owners of, the lands they occupy, thereby depriving the settlers of the benefit intended to be afforded them by such act of Congress in the form of payment of past damages; and

Whereas under the present act of Congress the determination of damages by the agents of the War Department is final and conclusive and not subject to review: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Minnesota (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President, the President elect, and the Congress of the United States be, and they hereby are, most earnestly requested to so amend the acts in question as to permit the settlers to appeal to the courts of the United States and to the courts of the State of Minnesota from the determination of the War Department of the damages suffered by them from the artificial flooding of their lands on the Lake of the Woods in years past, and to give to said courts jurisdiction to hear and determine appeals so taken; be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state of the State of Minnesota be, and he hereby is, instructed to transmit certified copies of this resolution to the President of the United States, the President elect of the United States, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives, the Secretary of War, the Chief of Engineers of the War Department, and to each Senator and Member of Congress from Minnesota.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD LAND GRANT

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state the inquiry.

Mr. KENDRICK. On yesterday the Chair laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. 17212) to alter and amend an act entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Lake Superior to Puget Sound, on the Pacific coast, by the northern route," approved July 2, 1864, and to alter and amend a joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution authorizing the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. to issue its bonds for the construction of its road and to secure the same by mortgage, and for other purposes," approved May 31, 1870; to declare forfeited to the United States certain claimed rights asserted by the Northern Pacific Railroad Co., or the Northern Pacific Railway Co.; to direct the institution and prosecution of proceedings looking to the adjustment of the grant, and for other purposes, and I requested that the House bill be substituted for a similar Senate bill. Was the request granted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] objected to the consideration of the bill. The bill can be placed on the calendar.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I did not object.

Mr. KENDRICK. No; I do not understand that the Senator from Montana objected.

Mr. KENDRICK. I ask that Senate bill No. 5855, bearing the same title, may be indefinitely postponed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senate bill will be indefinitely postponed.

EMPLOYMENT IN NAVY YARDS

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I have some correspondence which I have had with the Secretary of the Navy and with the office of the chief coordinator with respect to stabilization of employment in the navy yards, and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is ordered.

The correspondence is as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
January 23, 1929.

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF COORDINATOR,
Arlington Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIRS: I have been giving considerable thought to the consideration of the subject of stabilizing employment in our navy yards. I am convinced that if employment therein could be stabilized, the advantage would be tremendous to the Government. A good deal of unrest exists among employees at navy yards, particularly due to the large fluctuations of the force. When continuous work is in sight, employees have a different mental attitude toward their work than they do when they realize that employment is only temporary. This feeling is, of course, reflected in their efficiency and attitude toward the management and toward their work. A large turnover is expensive, especially in a navy yard where there are many established customs, rules, and regulations, and systems of planning and executing work. Large increases in force always lead to the employment of a certain amount of labor which ranks among the most inefficient in ratings.

Some statistics which I recently gathered show that at one navy yard in the calendar years from 1922 to 1928, out of a maximum number of employees of about 2,600, the fluctuations were, in two of these seven years, nearly 1,000; in three other years between 700 and 800; and only in one year less than 500.

It has occurred to me that a possible remedy for individual navy yards would be a systematic way of distributing the repair work and the modernization work. It has also occurred to me that another method would be to place more of the work for other Government departments in our navy yards—both manufacturing work and work on vessels and equipment afloat. This could be made to have a stabilizing effect by coordination of the various departments and by planning sufficiently in advance. Other departments referred to include the Treasury Department (Coast Guard and Customs Service), Department of Commerce (Lighthouse Service), and War Department (Quartermaster's Department).

I can appreciate the difficulties involved in the solution of this problem, but it does seem to me the fluctuation could be greatly reduced. Each navy yard must have a minimum total force which should be employed in order to do work economically. If the force falls much below this, which apparently happens frequently, the overhead rate increases rapidly.

I should appreciate your suggestions upon the subject, and I am sure your views, as a result of your experience, will be interesting and helpful.

The subject is of particular interest at the present time, as one of the committees of the Senate is considering the question of unemployment, and, as well, the question of stabilization as one of the important phases of the unemployment problem. Several private industries have given testimony of remarkable progress that has been made to this end.

Sincerely yours,

DAVID I. WALSH.

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF COORDINATOR,
Washington, January 23, 1929.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 22d instant, in regard to suggestions that would assist in stabilizing employment in our navy yards.

I will be very glad to give this matter study along the lines of your letter and will advise you further in regard to this matter at the earliest possible date.

Sincerely yours,

H. H. ROSSEAU,
Chief Coordinator.

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF COORDINATOR,
Washington, February 26, 1929.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR WALSH: Confirming our conversation of this morning and in reply to your letter of January 22, 1929, the following information has been obtained by this office concerning the fluctuation in the number of employees at the various navy yards:

The primary function of the navy yards is the repair and overhaul of ships in commission and the manufacturing of parts and equipment for such ships. The number of men employed for this work depends upon the amount of money appropriated by the Congress for this purpose. The assignment of naval vessels to the various yards must depend necessarily upon the service in which the vessels are engaged. With the major portion of the fleet engaged in service on the Pacific Ocean, where the two large navy yards are located, the repair and overhaul of the active fleet can be controlled so that the employment of labor for this purpose can be kept at practically a constant level.

The fluctuation in the number of employees at the West coast yards is caused by the construction of new vessels, which entails the employment of additional personnel whose services are no longer required after the new construction is completed.

Large jobs undertaken for other Government departments bring about the same fluctuation as construction jobs. On the East coast, where there are six navy yards, exclusive of the naval gun factory at Washington, there are fewer ships in active service and, consequently, there is less overhaul and repair work for each yard. The modernization of certain old battleships has been done and is being done at the east coast navy yards. This work also entails the employment of additional personnel, whose services are no longer required when the modernization is completed. In like manner, any large alterations or major repairs to vessels belonging to other departments of the country cause similar fluctuations.

So far as the Navy Department is concerned, both the office of the Chief of Naval Operations and the navy yard division of the Secretary's office devote constant attention to the matter of keeping the work of overhaul and repair of the active ships as equitably distributed as possible between the various yards. The amount of work done depends upon the amount of money appropriated by the Congress and the availability of ships for overhaul.

If I can be of any further use to you in this matter, please advise me.

Very truly yours,

H. H. ROUSSEAU,
Chief Coordinator.

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, January 22, 1929.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of January 14, 1929, requesting available information as to what the Navy Department is doing to stabilize employment in navy yards.

Stability of work conditions at navy yards has been accepted without question as a most important agency in securing economy of work and well-being of personnel, and has, therefore, been the subject of much continuous study. While it has not been possible to maintain stabilized conditions at all yards throughout all months of the year, on account of the many and changing factors involved, it is fair to state that our projected programs of work represent sincere and persistent efforts in that direction. It will be appreciated that the purposes for which funds are appropriated by Congress and the amounts of such appropriations exert an important influence on work conditions.

There are, exclusive of the naval gun factory at the navy yard, Washington, 8 continental navy yards, 2 on the West coast and 6 on the East coast. These eight yards perform work, the character of which may be classified roughly as follows:

(a) Repair and overhaul of ships in commission.
(b) Manufacturing parts and equipment.
(c) Modernization projects of certain vessels.
(d) Construction of new vessels.
(e) Preservation of vessels out of commission and of equipment.
(f) Work for other Government departments.

Of the foregoing, the only classifications which seriously influence employment conditions are the repair and overhaul of ships in commission, modernization projects, and new construction; work for other Government departments does so only when work is extensive.

Modernization projects, new construction, and extensive work for other government departments each involve so much work and extend over such long periods that additional workmen must usually be employed to accomplish them. Consequently, when that particular work is completed, with no similar projects at hand, it becomes necessary to make drastic discharges. This is not satisfactory, yet the department feels that its own modernization work in particular should be performed in navy yards.

The repair and overhaul of vessels in active service is considered the major mission of our navy yards; it is necessarily fluctuating in character and extent at different yards and, hence, seriously affects local employment conditions. The effect is less detrimental at the two yards on the West coast, where, since the major portion of our fleet is based on the coast, it is possible to so distribute the vessels throughout the year as to maintain reasonably stabilized conditions.

Conditions on the East coast, where there are six yards in operation, are by no means so satisfactory. The vessels based on these yards do not provide enough work for all to have stable work loads. The proposition of closing certain yards has been mooted from time to time with a view to the concentration of all work in the remaining yards; but this has met with opposition and apparently can not be carried out. As it is, some improvement in employment conditions might be effected by concentrating modernization and new construction in some one or two yards and performing all ship repair work in other yards. However, such procedure is dependent on securing from Congress appropriations to carry on a continuing program of modernization and new construction work which would thus provide for those yards in question.

All vessels in commission are assigned home yards at which, as a general proposition, they receive their annual overhauls. These overhauls are scheduled some months in advance and are in general carried out. Copies of the Schedule of Tentative Availability for Ships at Navy Yards are furnished for your information. These schedules are prepared semiannually and represent considerable study and work. They are based primarily on the operations of the fleet, for the department feels that the yards exist for the fleet and not the fleet for the yards. The need for stabilizing work conditions is, however, kept in mind, and the schedules forwarded herewith indicate the extent the department has gone to meet this end.

I trust that the foregoing outline of the procedure of the Navy, as regards the subject matter, will serve your purposes. However, should you desire, I will be glad to furnish your committee with any particular information requested, or, if preferable, have department representatives appear before the committee.

Sincerely yours,

CURTIS D. WILBUR.

HON. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate.

NATIONAL INSTITUTE OF HEALTH

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a brief article from the New England Journal of Medicine of February 21, 1929, relating to the bill pending relating to a national institute of health; also a brief article by the famous Harvey W. Wiley on the same subject which appeared in Good Housekeeping for March, 1929; also an article from the New Orleans States giving a brief interview with the governor of my State with reference to a plan which he has in contemplation for treating 5,000 State insane. I am anxious that Senators shall read all three of the articles.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the articles will be printed in the RECORD.

The articles are as follows:

[From New England Journal of Medicine, February 21, 1929]

AN UNWARRANTED ASSUMPTION

The Congress of the United States has before it for consideration three bills authorizing the establishment of a national institute of research, among the purposes of which is to provide for investigations in the medical sciences on subjects particularly pertaining to the public health. The Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service would be its administrative head, and the members of the service, especially those assigned to the Hygienic Laboratory, would be the agents for carrying on the various researches. The United States Public Health Service has an eminent and enviable national and international reputation for scientific ability and integrity, and its Hygienic Laboratory ranks high among similar institutions throughout the world for its contributions to medical knowledge as well as for the scrupulous and meticulous care it exercises over the manufacture and distribution of biologic products. While we are not familiar with all the provisions of these bills, we understand that they will authorize the Government to accept financial contributions for the support and furtherance of these investigation activities. We know of no applications of private or public funds which would bring any greater ultimate benefit to the people of the country than the one proposed and we know of no more conscientious administrators of such moneys than men of the type that constitute our Public Health Service.

It is, therefore, with amazement and, we feel, quite proper resentment that we read in the February 2 issue of the Journal of the American Medical Association a communication implying that the acceptance of funds from commercial firms or private foundations would corrupt this service. The correspondent goes so far as to say, "Passage of any of the proposed bills authorizing acceptance of private donations for the United States Public Health Service would amount to turning the United States Public Health Service over to the commercial manufacturers and private foundations."

It seems to us that this statement is entirely unwarranted and is a gratuitous insult to a department which has a history of long and beneficent service and distinguished traditions, and we regret that our usually esteemed contemporary opened its columns to such a letter.

To be sure, the writer of this letter pays his respects to the present Surgeon General and the personnel of the Hygienic Laboratory, but his fears for the character of the future members of this service lead him to make a statement which would be ridiculous if it were not sinister. This contributor is surely aware that for a long time just such funds have been accepted by many of our leading colleges and universities, with no consequent lowering of their high ethical standards, and that similar contributions to various scientific or welfare societies and other altruistic enterprises have in the main been conscientiously administered. We, therefore, do not share the correspondent's fear that with the acceptance of private funds venality will take the place of the independent and unbiased attitude that has so long characterized the decisions of our Federal health authorities, and we heartily and fully support any proper measures which will assist and extend the valuable work of our United States Public Health Service.

[From Good Housekeeping, March, 1929]

MORE THAN ANYTHING ELSE THIS COUNTRY NEEDS A NATIONAL INSTITUTE OF HEALTH, SAYS HARVEY W. WILEY, M. D.

When the Constitution was accepted by the thirteen original States, with it was accepted the plan of a Cabinet of advisors to the President, who would each specialize in one branch of government interest and supervise the national activity in that branch.

A Secretary of War was essential, every one admitted. The war just concluded established the possibility of future wars. A Secretary of State was necessary to conduct the diplomatic affairs of the new Republic. A Secretary of the Treasury was required to mold the Nation's financial structure. And so on through the list.

Several other members have been added to that first Cabinet list, but the most essential of all we have thus far omitted—a secretary of health. Upon that branch of the Government all the other activities depend. Without healthy citizens we can wage no successful war. Without healthy citizens there can be no healthy state. Without healthy citizens the education we have made free to every child, rich or poor, will fail in its effect, will be wasted, its opportunities neglected or ignored.

The chief institution protecting the health of our Nation is the Hygienic Laboratory, working in conjunction with the Public Health Service. The prevention of hookworm and of pellagra are two notable accomplishments of the Hygienic Laboratory, which illustrate without need of any further proof the immense value of the work it is doing.

On May 3, 1928, Senator JOSEPH E. RANSDELL, of Louisiana, introduced a bill into the Senate (S. 4518) to change the name of the Hygienic Laboratory to the "National Institute of Health." It was referred to the Committee on Commerce of the Senate, hearings were held thereon, and a favorable report (No. 1280) was issued by the unanimous vote of the committee.

A similar bill, No. 15212, was introduced in the House of Representatives by Representative KINDRED, of New York, on December 11, 1928. Unfortunately, it is not likely that this bill will receive the approval of Congress during the present short session.

There seems to be no doubt that enlarged activities in the promotion of health which will be conferred upon the National Institute of Health will greatly increase the facilities of the present Hygienic Laboratory to safeguard the health of the people of the United States.

The total appropriation available to the Hygienic Laboratory for fighting diseases in men, women, and children during the current year was only a little in excess of $40,000. Senator RANSDELL called attention to this meager appropriation as compared with the appropriations of the Department of Agriculture for the purpose of eliminating the diseases of plants and farm animals.

Senator COPELAND mentioned the fact that Congress had given $10,000,000 to fight the corn borer and was now asking for $5,000,000 to fight the pink bollworm; that a few years ago we gave $5,000,000 to prevent cholera in hogs, and another $5,000,000 to fight the hoof-and-mouth disease in cattle.

But from the economic point of view, it can easily be shown that research directed toward the prevention of diseases of human animals, and discoveries of methods of cure as well as of immunization, are worthy of even more consideration, of even more general appropriations than for plants and animals.

Many printed statements have been made of the cost to mankind of colds alone, and their sequelæ. Colds in some form or other attack practically every American citizen at least once a year, frequently following each other in rapid sequence. Colds are not self-immunizing as are many infectious diseases, such as measles and smallpox, in which nature creates a quantity of immunizing materials which render the patient for many years, often a lifetime, immune from a recurrence of the disease. This antibody does not seem to be developed by the ordinary cold. Colds frequently bring on other diseases—bronchitis, influenza, pneumonia, tonsillitis, deafness, impairment of sight, and occasionally fever and circulatory diseases. If the institute of health could devise a plan by means of which one-half of the colds which now attack our citizens could be prevented, it would be an economic triumph which would mean much in the family budget of expenses.

Perhaps the proper method of presenting measures of this kind to a congressional committee and to the public at large would be through the economic factor. If health could be clothed in the garb of profits, there would be a greater popular interest in listening to a discussion of it.

The principal trouble with data of this kind heretofore has been that it is almost entirely an estimate in which the imagination plays the important part. When the institute of health is established it should be able to collect actual data in regard to this matter which would be of the highest utility because of its accuracy. A sufficient number of persons in different parts of the country should be kept under scrutiny of the agents of this institute to determine the actual hours lost at school and labor through colds, and the money paid for the services of a physician and for the remedies used. The total charge upon the family budget for a whole year as a result of avoidable diseases could be marshaled in an argument before a congressional committee and before the public at large with a powerful effect.

As soon as the human race is convinced that it pays to keep well, the services of such an institution will be more highly appreciated.

The fact that the death rate from tuberculosis has been so greatly reduced as to displace that disease from the head of mortality lists has led to the introduction, in the incipient stages of that disease, of out-door habits of life, nourishing food materials, and desired rest from violent exercise, which do so much toward lowering the death rate of this once dreaded disease. From the budget point of view this justifies the desirability of necessary expenditures to bring into proper activity these immunizing methods. A dollar spent in immunizing a patient from tuberculosis, or removing the first incipient stages therein, grows to five or ten dollars of expenditure if the disease should be left to full development.

It is not at all out of the realm of probability to look forward in a few years in our own country to a time when the Public Health Service may claim still higher dignity. Numerous attempts have been made to secure both for education and public health the status of an executive character. As agriculture, after a long service as a mere independent bureau, became in 1888 an executive department, the change in dignity of the position worked wonders. At the time the Department of Agriculture became an executive department in the Government, with a seat in the President's Cabinet, the total money voted by Congress for its maintenance was only a few million dollars. The influence of the department grew rapidly after this elevation. What the Secretary of Agriculture said ought to be done carried much greater authority, and received much more serious consideration at the hands of Congress, than a similar recommendation made by a mere bureau chief. The Secretary of Agriculture has not only the ear of the President, but also the ears of his fellow members of the Cabinet. Even to a greater degree he has the ears of the Members of Congress. The total appropriations of the Department of Agriculture to-day are well on the way to $200,000,000 a year.

It is not too much to expect that a department of health, once established, would equal if not surpass the record made by the Department of Agriculture, as its supreme importance became more generally appreciated by the public.

MEN WHO APPROVE THE BILL

In the hearings which were held on this bill introduced by Senator RANSDELL there was a unanimous approval of this purpose by all who appeared before the committee. Among these were such important men as Dr. Charles H. Herty, of the Chemical Foundation; Senator Royal S. Copeland, of New York; Dr. Reid Hunt, of Harvard University Medical School and president of the Pharmacopœial Convention of the United States; Dr. A. H. Ebeling, president of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research; Prof. Treat B. Johnson, of Yale University; Dr. C. Willard Camalier, member of the American Dental Association; Surgeon J. W. Kerr, of the United States Public Health Service; Dr. A. M. Stimson, assistant surgeon, United States Public Health Service; Dr. Arthur T. McCormack, State health officer of Kentucky; and Dr. E. F. Kelly, secretary of the American Pharmaceutical Association. No one appeared in opposition.

Eminent medical men who were not able to appear personally before the committee wrote letters in approval of the plan. Among these were Dr. W. J. Mayo, Dr. W. W. Keen, Dr. Lewellys F. Barker, Dr. George E. Vincent, Dr. Herman N. Bundesen, Dr. Ray Lyman Wilbur, and many others

If you would do your part in protecting the health of your own children and the children of the future, place your approval of this bill before your Congressman and your Senators, so that when it comes up there will be no question of its passing.

MENTAL DISEASES SUBJECT TO CURE—GOVERNOR ANNOUNCES PLANS FOR TREATING 5,000 STATE INSANE

BATON ROUGE, LA., February 26—(Special).—An intensive study of all the problems affecting the mentally sick and feeble-minded and the inauguration of a complete program with equipment necessary to furnish every modern science and health facility for the cure of the insane is soon to be in use in Louisiana, Governor Long announced Monday following a conference with Dr. H. H. McClelland, of Dayton, Ohio, who was called to Baton Rouge to consult with the directors of the State's three institutions which treat mental diseases.

The governor said the work of the three institutions was to be coordinated and a social-welfare department would be established for each so that a patient may be watched after his release in order that he will not again go back into the state which required his confinement.

NEARLY 5,000 INSANE

There are nearly 5,000 insane and feeble-minded in the three institutions and the number is constantly on the increase, the governor said, but it is hoped that with the new methods the number will soon be on the decrease.

The governor said one of the principal efforts at cure would be made along the lines of rectifying the physical ailments which, in many cases, cause the insanity, and in line with this, he said, 1,500 abscessed teeth were extracted from the mentally sick at the Central Louisiana Hospital at Pineville during the first few days after Dr. Clarence Pearson took charge. The governor said the institution at Jackson had made many cures along the lines proposed to be used to a greater extent.

Discussing his plans, Governor Long said:

"It was found, from taking 400 cases, that 6 per cent of the people eliminated the food which they ate in 24 hours time. That was the normal period. But that, from a radiograph examination, 94 per cent of the people taken into the institutions for the mentally sick required from 30 to 300 hours to eliminate food taken into the body. This quite often results in auto poisoning (self-poisoning) and a person becomes as violent as a maniac, and thousands of people have died from a mere matter of toxic poison."

CURES AT JACKSON

"Our institution at Jackson, experimenting along this line, has made several cures. We will install the equipment and broaden our scope so as to give every person the benefit of this kind of treatment. Doctor McClelland has taken 19 hopeless cases and treated them along this line, resulting in 6 of the 19 being sent to their homes and thereafter taking care of themselves.

"Some months ago I had a friend whose case had been given up as being practically hopeless. He was suffering from every kind of mental disorder. I went to his home. It so happened that I had tried a number of lawsuits where this kind of malady had been pretty well rehearsed on the witness stands by the doctors. I instantly saw that this friend of mine was suffering from toxic poison. I called two physicians from Shreveport and consulted with them and they agreed. Within 10 days' time this party became as normal as any other human, and is so to-day.

"We are in the front ranks to-day with some of the modern facilities and treatment which we are giving to the insane, but our institutions are undersupplied. What the heads of our institutions and Doctor McClelland now propose to do is to chart off the various and sundry disturbances that are taken to be insanity, when they are really not, and prescribe the kind of treatment that should be given, which will keep many from ever being sent to the hospitals; but if they do, hospitals will be equipped to give the most complete kind of examination and the most careful kind of treatment, so as to clear up cases which will yield to the most simple kind of modern science.

SOCIAL WELFARE

"We are going to coordinate the three institutions for the mentally sick and establish a social welfare department for them all, so that after a patient is released they may be watched, so that their condition will not be allowed to become what it was before they were sent to the hospital.

"Doctor McClelland has returned to Ohio, under the promise that he will come back to Louisiana and assist us in coordinating our work and modernizing our departments.

"We have about 2,600 patients in one institution, about 1,400 in another, and several hundred in another. The number is constantly on the increase. We believe that there is a great chance that we can begin to give such service to the mentally sick that within months to come we can begin to decrease the number of mentally afflicted, rather than to have it constantly on the increase in Louisiana. If we save 100 persons and restore them to normalcy, or even 10 (and there is a hope of savings hundreds and probably thousands), it will be the most meritorious work of this administration.

FEW REALLY INSANE

"Science is developing and, I think, will develop that few people are actually insane. Our institutions must get away from the fact that the cases are incurable or that the matter is one so much due to inheritance. When toxic infections and all other physical disorders are corrected, I think and the doctors think that there is going to be a remarkable improvement in the patients of this State."

ADDRESS BY BISHOP JAMES CANNON, JR.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD an address by Bishop James Cannon, jr., of Virginia, delivered in New York City February 8, 1929, on the subject of prohibition.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen: In view of the nature of this occasion I have thought it proper to commit what I have to say to a sound form of words in writing.

At a private dinner in this city about three years ago each guest was asked to state what he considered to be the outstanding fact in the life and work of the world to-day. When my turn came I ventured to say that, to-day, 1,900 years after Christ, the most outstanding fact in the life work of the world is the steady, irresistible translation into the lives of individuals and into the social order of the teaching of Jesus Christ concerning the vital—absolutely central truth of human brotherhood—of the positive obligation of neighborly love, including willing self-denial, and the far-reaching implications which necessarily follow the acceptance and the recognition of that teaching. This teaching, as Jesus prophesied, has been as leaven hidden in the meal, which will continue to work until the whole shall be leavened.

This teaching is revolutionary in its aim and world-wide in its sweep. If the followers of Jesus Christ are to be true to the teachings of their Master, they can not be indifferent to influences and conditions which affect, indeed, often dominate, the whole industrial and social order. The salvation by regeneration of individual men and women is not less important, not less fundamental, to-day than it has ever been. But all such individuals, when genuinely regenerated, must become veritable apostles, proclaiming the application of the teachings of Jesus Christ to every form of industry, to every social activity. Christian love can not be content with a system which produces a small group living in abounding luxury and wealth and a multitude in comparative poverty, with many, indeed, in abject poverty and misery—with long hours, low wages, night work, especially for women and children, which absolutely prevent the building up of happy, wholesome home life. When Jesus Christ proclaimed and exemplified the law of love, he sounded forth the evangel which must finally usher in a day of redemption for the entire industrial and social order.

To be specific, it is this teaching of Jesus which declares the right of all men and women to a living wage, to limited hours of toil, to better medical care, to a larger general participation in the fruits of industry, to more leisure, to more parks, playgrounds, amusements, reading rooms, libraries, and general recreation; in short, to whatever makes for a fuller, richer life.

It is this same teaching which declares that men must no longer kill their brother men, and so which demands the abolition of war, adherence to a world court, the formation and maintenance of an association or league of nations, and a spiritual and physical disarmament. This teaching demands the complete abolition of the sale of human beings for purposes of slavery, of the traffic in women and children for immoral purposes, and of the traffic in narcotic drugs and intoxicating liquors.

All these things the true follower of Jesus Christ must recognize and must declare to be the necessary, the inevitable consequences of the working of this quickening, redemptive leaven.

It is my understanding that the Christian Herald Association is fully, unequivocally, aggressively committed to the work of bringing in of this new heaven and new earth, wherein shall dwell righteousness. It is, therefore, needless to say that I greatly appreciate the action of the Christian Herald Association in selecting me as the American who, during 1928, has made the most significant contribution to religious progress, for this action clearly recognizes that the work which I have tried to do was not primarily political, as that word is commonly used, but was an effort in support of the application of the teaching of Jesus Christ to the solution of one of the greatest age-long problems of humanity. For the Master's teaching of human brotherhood does not lose its meaning or its loving imperative when it faces the horrible ravages of the traffic in intoxicating liquors.

It will not agree that human brotherhood and brotherly love become weak and helpless when faced with the appetites of men and women for strong drink. It will not agree that this monster, with its awful toll of misery and death, shall continue to exist because there are elements, high and low, in the social life who are unwilling to pluck out their right eye, or to cut off their right hand, but prefer rather to destroy those with their drink for whom love died. Surely there can be no evasion on this question. This is the real issue, the real battle ground in the fight against drink. It is the age-long battle between self-indulgence and self-denial, or, better still, between appetite and love. For the basal principle underlying the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States is not Puritanism, or compulsion, as is mistakenly declared. It is the principle of brotherly love applied to the solution of this age-long problem.

The teaching of Jesus has developed a new social conscience, which declares and recognizes the rights and duties of organized society as positively and with as sweeping and imperative as the individual conscience declares the rights and duties of the individual. This social conscience to-day brushes aside, without any hesitation, any claim of any individual to perform any action or to enjoy any privilege, which action or indulgence is a menace to the physical or moral safety of life of the community in which he lives. This social conscience frankly declares that a man's private life, his right to unrestrained personal activity, ceases the moment any act of his life affects the life of other members of the social order of which, whether he likes it or not, he is a part.

Robinson Crusoe was free to shoot when and where he pleased while alone on his island, but when his man Friday came it was his duty to locate Friday before he fired. Men may own high-powered motor cars for pleasure or business, but the killing of over 25,000 and the maiming of over 700,000 people in the United States last year, and a similar awful record in other countries, compels stringent restrictive speed laws and sober drivers. Men may prefer wooden houses as cheaper or more beautiful or more healthful than brick or stone, but the law prohibits such buildings in business districts. Quarantine laws require men to remain on cholera-infected ships until danger of infection is past, no matter how inconvenient or expensive to the individual such detention may be. A man's income may be no more than he thinks necessary for proper comfort, but organized society—the State—compels men to give up part of that income to pay for roads, police protection, support of paupers and insane, and for education, even though he, himself, may have no children. Smoking in powder mills or garages is forbidden, no matter how much individuals may desire that indulgence. When the country is attacked by enemies, the Government requires men to leave home and business and face separation, financial loss, wounds, disease, even death, for the defense of the common country.

Countless examples could be given of restrictions put by society upon the "private life" of the individual, but the advocates of individualism, alas, too often of purely selfish individualism, animated by appetite or covetousness, or both, still raise a great outcry against any law to limit or to prohibit the use of intoxicating beverages as "a forcible, immoral, and tyrannical invasion of their private life and personal conduct." (Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler.) But such protests and reasoning are but an echo of a bygone age. The enlightened social conscience of to-day absolutely refuses to recognize anything as "private life and personal conduct" which affects the "general welfare." If, therefore, at any time the issue is clearly joined between the right to selfish individualism to the indulgence of the appetite for intoxicants and the right of society to protect itself from the effects of such self-indulgence, the law of love, Christ's teaching concerning human brotherhood, demands unhesitatingly that the indulgence of the appetite of the individual be willingly, gladly surrendered by all true followers of Jesus for the sake of the weak brother, for whom love would die.

But this same principle of human brotherhood applied by the new social order, which new social order it must be remembered is the very product of this very teaching of Jesus Christ, goes further than a mere appeal, and preemptorily orders that, whether willingly or unwillingly, all opportunities for the indulgence of appetite be prohibited if in providing such opportunities it becomes evident that the best interests of society generally, indeed, almost inevitably, suffer. This prohibitory method may not be approved by the selfish offender; it may indeed excite great resentment and a determination to indulge the clamoring appetite despite any law, however drastic; but organized society, or Government, has swept in its aim beyond the simple question of the control or the reform of the appetite of an individual for his own sake alone (which is truly most desirable) to the broader question of how society can protect itself from the refusal of such individual to abstain voluntarily from a selfish indulgence which admittedly involves danger to the entire social life of the country.

The cry of Puritanism, of the determination of certain elements of society to compel others to surrender their pleasures, the charge that prohibition is the product of a bunch of long-faced, hypocritical killjoys, is utterly absurd, indeed silly. For whatever the church or the Puritan might or might not be able to do, our present-day economic, industrial, and social life has decided that it can not and will not any longer tolerate alcoholism with its attendant evils, but will compel the abolition of a traffic which always and everywhere produces such results. The battles for State and national prohibition have been fought and won; not to delight the so-called sour-faced Puritans but to "promote the general welfare," which is proclaimed to be one of the purposes of the adoption of the Constitution of the United States.

The eighteenth amendment to that Constitution was ratified by a larger number of States than any other amendment for a hundred years. That amendment provides, "The manufacture, the sale, the importation, the exportation, the transportation of intoxicating liquors is hereby prohibited," and so forth. This amendment to the Constitution changed the status of the beverage liquor traffic from that of a permitted licensed traffic to that of a criminal traffic. The change was sweeping and put the brand of a criminal and outlaw upon the manufacturer, seller, and transporter of intoxicants.

Since the ratification of the eighteenth amendment there has been organized opposition to the enforcement and to the continuance of that amendment unamended. That opposition was declared in the Democratic National Convention at San Francisco in 1920, with Gov. Alfred E. Smith as the openly recognized representative of that opposition. The same opposition was manifested in the Democratic National Convention in New York in 1924, and that opposition reached its climax in the Democratic convention at Houston in June, 1928, when Alfred E. Smith was nominated for President of the United States, and immediately made his bid for the support of the "wet" element in the country by calling for drastic changes in the prohibition law which changes, if carried into effect, would have resulted in 48 different varieties of prohibition, might even have turned the machinery of government into an agency to handle the traffic in intoxicants, and would have, most important of all, changed the status of the manufacturer, seller, and transporter of intoxicants from that of an outlawed criminal to that of a law-abiding citizen.

The fundamental issue involved in the last presidential election was: "Shall the brand of the outlaw be removed from the trafficker in intoxicants, and shall he be recognized once more as a law-abiding citizen? Or, in other words, shall the general welfare of the new social order be once more legally subordinated to selfish individualism? Shall appetite and covetousness, the twin taproots of the liquor traffic, or shall the social and moral betterment of the people as a whole take precedence in the law of the land? Shall the Constitution and the statute law of the United States be stripped of the most far-reaching, uplifting social legislation ever enacted by any country in any age? This was the issue which southern people, especially, were called upon to face in the last presidential election. The conflict was not entirely unexpected, and positive, explicit warning was given more than a year ago that the southern people would not commit both political and moral suicide by supporting a "wet" Tammany candidate. But "wet" Tammany elements in absolute control of the Houston convention ignored all protests and danger signals, and nominated their "wet" candidate. Faced by such a situation, it was necessary to decide what action should be taken to preserve unsullied the principles and ideals of the southern people. Circumstances and duty seemed to join in the demand that in that campaign your speaker should give primary direction to what has been known as the anti-Smith movement, which was later carried to such a successful culmination by the united efforts of many able, patriotic men and women throughout the South. The result was never in doubt to those who knew the southern people—who knew that they needed only a call to the colors to show to the whole world their loyalty to right principles. No greater satisfaction has ever come to your speaker than the recognition which has now been given by the whole country—that when moral issues are at stake the southern people will stand by principles, regardless of previous political party predilections or affiliations.

It is exceedingly regrettable that, in their desperation, the Smith-Raskob leadership resorted to such methods to minify the prohibition question in the South, while deliberately magnifying it in the North and East. The religious issue was deliberately thrust into the campaign by Chairman Raskob and Candidate Smith, hoping that the baseless cry of religious persecution would excite sympathy and weaken the force of the appeals of those opposing the Democratic candidate because of his "wet" Tammany affiliations. But, regardless of this reprehensible injection of the religious issue, a great victory was won for prohibition, which, as has been indicated above, is one of the most epochal, outstanding applications of Christ's teaching of human brotherhood to the social life of a great Nation.

In conclusion, may I again express my very profound appreciation of the recognition by the Christian Herald Co. that the outstanding issue in the recent political campaign was not primarily political, but was essentially moral and religious, involving as it did the rejection or the approval of the law of love as applied to the social relationships of everyday life. For, as I stated in the beginning, this teaching of Jesus is revolutionary in its aim and world-wide in its scope. It has erected a standard by which, whether men like it or not, all our habits, customs, and laws must finally inevitably be judged. The Master's law of love must be applied to industrial, economic, social, racial, family, international, and, indeed, to every relation of life, and the Kingdom of Heaven will come in when every relation of life shall have been leavened by the sweetening, redemptive, saving power of this truly heavenly teaching.

REAPPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, one of the grave features of the default of the reapportionment bill, to which I have adverted on many occasions, is the unconstitutional complexion of the Presidential Electoral College. There is a very illuminating discussion of this subject in the New York Evening Post, and I ask unanimous consent to have the editorial printed in the RECORD. Also on the same question there is an editorial in the New York World, which I also ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Evening Post]

DO SENATORS WISH ANOTHER HAYES-TILDEN CONTEST?

In English history we read with indignation of the glaring misrepresentation which existed in the House of Commons down to 1832. Districts once populous which had dwindled to hamlets or to actual wastes still had the right to choose Members of Parliament, the right being exercised by whoever happened to own the deserted land. On the other hand, large cities which had grown up in modern times were virtually unrepresented.

But we can no longer condemn this state of affairs without hitting ourselves. In Michigan there are three congressional districts with an average population of 800,000 each. There are districts in other States with less than 160,000. One person in any of these districts counts for as much as five persons in any of the three districts in Michigan.

In California there is one district with a population of 1,500,000. There are whole States with that many inhabitants which have half a dozen or more Representatives in the House to the California district's one.

Nor is this all. The discrepancy reaches further than Congress. It touches the Presidency. Since the electoral vote of a State is equal to the total number of its Senators and Representatives, States which do not have their fair share of Members in the House are similarly underrepresented in the Electoral College.

California and Kentucky have the same number of electoral votes, 13. But California has a population of 4,400,000, while Kentucky has only 2,500,000. Suppose there were another close election like the one of 1916, with Kentucky instead of California casting the deciding vote. Then we might have not merely a minority President—which we did not have in 1916—but a President whose majority in the electoral vote was due directly to overrepresentation of that minority in the Electoral College.

This would be a result squarely at variance not only with the spirit but also with the plain letter of the Constitution. Such an election might be challenged when the votes were counted, as the election returns of the Hayes-Tilden election were challenged, and with much less room for debate than was the case in 1876, when there were fraud and intimidation on both sides.

In holding up the reapportionment bill the Senate is playing with dynamite.

[From the New York World]

ANOTHER DEFEAT FOR REAPPORTIONMENT

Once more the enemies of reapportionment, taking advantage of the congested Senate Calendar, have administered chloroform to an important piece of legislation. The House of Representatives passed the Fenn bill by an overwhelming vote. Since it affected the House and the Electoral College only, it would seem that the Senate might have accepted it. But a determined filibuster has forced its chief advocate, Senator VANDENBERG, to announce that he has dropped it. The Fenn bill was a mild measure, being in a sense merely provisional. It provided that if Congress failed to follow the censuses of 1930, 1940, and other years with immediate reapportionment legislation, then reapportionment should take place automatically according to the method of "major fractions." Yet even this provisional law to prevent a continuance of the present unjust situation has been lost.

There can be no mistaking the motive behind the opposition in the Senate. It came from Members whose States will lose congressional seats in a fair reapportionment. Senator BLACK of Alabama told the story when he said that he would vote against a "measure which is destined in the long run to change prematurely the great balance of legislative power in this Nation from the rural districts to the great metropolitan areas."

In other words, even at the cost of defiance of the Constitution, the urban States, increasing in population as compared with rural States, will be denied a reapportionment. This opposition will be intensified after the 1930 census. The one way to forestall it is to see that the Fenn bill is pushed through Mr. Hoover's special session.

CATHOLIC-PROTESTANT MARRIAGES—DECISION OF JUDGE CHICHESTER

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a Virginia Supreme Court decision in the case of Harlow against Harlow and comments thereon, as published in an Alabama newspaper.

There being no objection the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Birmingham News, Tuesday, October 30, 1928]

THE SUPREME COURT CONDEMNS CATHOLIC CLAIM THAT PROTESTANT MARRIAGES ARE ILLEGAL

Some of the Smithites in Alabama are trying to make it appear that Al Smith and his Roman Catholic associates do not practice the teachings of the Roman Catholic Church that all Protestant marriages are illegal, and that the parties thereto are living in adultery and that the children of such marriages are illegitimate.

The Supreme Court of Virginia decided that question against them this year.

John M. Harlow married a Protestant woman and lived very happily with her for two years. He was taken desperately ill and carried to his Catholic mother's home, where he lingered a few days. While there his Catholic relations and two Catholic priests caused him to change his life-insurance policy from his lawful wife to them, and renounce his lawful wife on his death bed, "to get his soul out of hell," for contracting a marriage with a Protestant.

The wife brought suit for the alienation of her husband's affections by this Catholic crew after his mind had weakened. A Virginia jury gave the wife a verdict for $20,000 and the Catholics appealed to the supreme court. The supreme court made them pay. Read the court's scathing denunciation of Catholics for setting up their belief about marriage "above the law of the land, which they undertook to nullify." (Harlow et al v. Harlow, 143 S. E. Rept. 720. Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Decided June 14, 1928.)

Opinion by Mr. Justice Chichester:

John M. Harlow, referred to frequently in the record as "Dick" Harlow, deceased husband of Gladys E. C. Harlow, the plaintiff, was twice married. He was divorced by his first wife, whom he married in 1901. He had one child, a daughter, now Mrs. McGinnis, by this marriage. In 1921 he married the defendant in error, a New York girl who came to Washington to work during the war. There is ample proof in the record that John M. Harlow and his second wife were very much devoted to each other both before and after their marriage, and up to the time, during his last illness, when he went or was carried to Alexandria to the home of his mother, Rose Harlow. He had been a shiftless and somewhat wild person up to the time of his second marriage. After that he was saving and industrious, evidently under the influence of his wife, who appears to have been a most excellent and estimable woman and wife. At the time of his last illness, his wife, who continued to work for the Government after her marriage, as she had been doing before, had deposited from her own earnings in a savings bank, to the credit of her husband, $936, and her husband had a checking account for current expenses in another bank of between $400 and $500.

After his marriage he and his wife, the plaintiff, lived in an apartment in Washington. He became ill in the spring of 1923 and grew steadily worse until he died.

His people were Roman Catholics and he was, or had been, a member of the church also. His first wife was a Roman Catholic, but his second wife, the plaintiff, was a Protestant. This, however, seemed to make no difference in the happiness of the couple, until the husband went or was taken to Alexandria on August 4, 1923, after he became ill, where he went to spend the day, but where he remained until his death on September 17, 1923. His wife acquiesced in his remaining in Alexandria, where he could have the attention his mother, sisters, and brothers would give him, during her absence at her office during the day, but at first she visited him every day. Prior to the time when members of his family were notified of his illness, they either did not know, or pretended not to know, of his second marriage, and they apparently never recognized their brother and the plaintiff as husband and wife. Before the brother had ever come to Alexandria even for a visit of a day at a time one or more of them told the plaintiff that he had lost his soul and that she (plaintiff) would have to help him get it back.

(1) His mother, Rose Harlow; two brothers, George Harlow and Edwin Harlow; and two sisters, Mrs. Lillian Harlow Green and Mary D. Harlow, lived together in the same house in Alexandria. Mrs. Hartigan, the other defendant, lived in Washington. When John M. Harlow was taken to the Alexandria home in an almost dying condition on August 4, there is no doubt about the fact that the defendant in error was a most devoted wife, and that he was a most devoted husband. That his whole attitude toward his wife was changed during the six weeks he lived in the home of his mother and sisters and brothers, that he became alienated in his affection for her, and finally renounced her, is beyond question. That this change was willfully brought about by the united efforts of at least the mother, Mrs. Green, Miss Mary Harlow, and George Harlow the jury had a right to conclude from the testimony of the plaintiff which, the record shows, was corroborated on every material point.

It is probably true that the conduct of the defendants was not animated in the beginning by any personal animosity toward the plaintiff. Their zeal may have been the result of religious fanaticism running wild. They believed that a marriage, once entered into, could not be dissolved by divorce, and that the marriage of a divorced person was unlawful, immoral, and adulterous, although the law of the land was to the contrary. They all admitted this. There had for many years been substantially no contact between them and the plaintiff's husband. He was living in Washington, active in the affairs of the world, and out of touch and sympathy with the narrow views of his family. Their lives were in channels so far apart that none of the defendants, if they are to be believed, even knew he was married until a long time afterwards, when he telephoned them that he was ill, and they came, seeing with their own eyes that he was living with a woman. One of the plaintiffs in error, Mrs. Green, came to the apartment, met his wife, and then for the first time knew definitely that he was married. Immediately on that first visit she said to the plaintiff:

"Gladys, you have got to help get his soul back. He has lost it, and you've got to let him go back to the church."

From this time on, the united idea of at least four of the defendants seems to have been to get his wife out of his life, because, as they viewed it, there had been no lawful marriage. When she did not yield to their wishes and suggestions and eliminate herself, they proceeded to bend every effort to eliminate her, and from this time their malicious and vindictive spirit toward her is evident in every word and deed.

After her husband went to Alexandria on August 4, the plaintiff, at first, went over there from Washington to see him every day, but it became apparent at an early date that she was not wanted so often, and her time was limited frequently by demand of members of the family to a visit of 10 minutes. Plaintiff testified that they (referring to Mrs. Harlow, the mother, Mrs. Green, Miss Mary Harlow, and the brother, George Harlow) would meet her at the door, and "when they saw who had called would say, 'Well, you might see him. We will see if he is up,' or 'sitting up,' and they would treat me very coolly and indifferent, slam the doors, and rush past me, and not address me."

It was proved in the evidence that a Roman Catholic priest visited the husband nearly every day. In spite of all this, the husband does not seem to have weakened materially in his affections for his wife until after the latter part of August, when he had greatly weakened physically, because, just prior to that time he requested his wife to come over and get him and take him back home; but it became more apparent every day that the plaintiff's visits were unwelcome to members of the household, and she was told that she should not come so often, that people were talking about her, that she was not "Dick's" legal wife, and that she had lived with him in adultery for two years.

Finally, contrary to the usual custom, the plaintiff was invited over to Alexandria to see her husband on the 1st of September. She states that Mrs. Hartigan, the sister living in Washington, phoned her, reminding her that she had been told to come to Alexandria on the 1st of September. She was not suspicious of this unusual invitation until she reached Alexandria, where she found Mrs. Harlow, the mother, the sisters, and George Harlow. She was admitted by Miss Mary Harlow. What occurred thereafter is best told in her own language:

"Q. Did you say anything?—A. Admitted me. No; nothing in particular.

"Q. Did she greet you at all?—A. She just merely opened the door. I went along upstairs to where my husband was. When I entered his room, Mrs. Green and he were there. He said: 'Well, Pet, it is all over. I have renounced you.' Mrs. Green said: 'Yes; you will never see him again. He will never live with you again. This is the last time you will ever see him.'

"Q. Was any one there besides her and you?—A. Miss Mary Harlow.

"Q. Did she hear?—A. She also said: 'Yes; you will never see him again.'

"Q. Did she say that, too?—A. Absolutely.

"Q. Were any of the others there?—A. I don't remember any others right in the room at that time.

"Q. What did you say in their presence, if anything?—A. I said: 'Why, I am his legal wife.'

"Q. Proceed.—A. I said: 'He can't renounce me. He can't give me up. If he wants to go back to the church, that is all right. I never interfered with anything that he does. He can go to church, but I am his legal wife.'

"Q. What was said to that and by whom?—A. They said: 'Oh, you are not. We don't recognize you. You have been living in adultery for two years.'

"Q. Well, now, who said that?—A. Miss Harlow and Mrs Green both voiced it.

"Q. Anything else said?—A. They told me I could stay just a few minutes.

"Q. How long did you stay on that occasion?—A. Probably 10 or 15 minutes.

"Q. Well, did you ever see him again?—A. Once.

"Q. Well, where were you when Doctor Rutherford went in?—A. I was outside in the machine.

"Q. Did you see him go in?—A. Yes.

"Q. How soon afterwards did you go in?—A. I went in shortly after.

"Q. What happened after you got in that you saw yourself and heard?—A. I went in with Mrs. Nichols and Mr. Clybourne, and as I entered the hall George Harlow was coming down the stairs, and I said, 'I want to see Dick. I have come over to see if he can get medical attention and see about taking him to a hospital.' He grabbed me by both arms and said, 'You will never see him. You can't see him. You are not his wife.'

"Q. What was his manner of seizing you?—A. He grabbed me by both arms.

"Q. Was it violent or gentle?—A. Very violently.

"Q. Did it disturb your equilibrium at all; your balance?—A. Well, Mrs. Nichols was right directly back of me. He gave me such a push that I fell against her.

"Q. Was his grasp painful or not?—A. Well, I know that the red marks lasted for some time.

"Q. What sort of marks? Do you mean black and blue marks on your arm?—A. No; just red marks from pressure.

"Q. How long were they apparent on your arms?—A. About a day.

"Q. Did you actually observe them when you got home that night?—A. Yes.

"Q. What happened after that? Did he say anything more?—A. He said I couldn't see him. He kept repeating that over and over again, 'You will never see him. You can't see him. You are not his wife.'

"Q. Proceed. Hurry on. Tell the story.—A. So he was trying to back up the stairs to get up to the room, and I told him, kept telling him, 'I want to see him because I am his lawful wife. You can't keep me from seeing him.' And he kept repeating, 'You can't see him. You can't see him.' And about that time he ran back up the stairs and locked both doors to the room in which my husband lay.

"Q. Where were the other members of the family at that time, if you remember?—A. I remember seeing his mother down on the first floor. She came along the little hallway that led through the dining room, and she said, 'This is such an outrage. Get her out of here. She is back here again. She isn't his wife.' And also at the top of the stairs, when I went up the stairs after George Harlow had released me, Mrs. Green was at the top of the stairs right here at the little landing. She grabbed me by the arms and tried to pull me in the room in the rear.

"Q. Did she say anything?—A. She said: 'You can't go in there. You can't see him. You have been living in adultery. You are not his wife.'

"Q. Proceed. What happened after that?—A. Mrs. Nichols took hold of me, and released me, and she kept calling for the chief of police. So George Harlow, after he had locked my husband in the room, I think he was the one that went across the street to notify the chief of police. He came over shortly after that, and they were all talking and saying that I could not see him; could not get in. The chief of police——

"Q. Well, were the doors of his room opened again?—A. I tried to plead with them that I had brought this doctor to examine him and to talk with him and see what he could do for him. They finally consented to let him in by himself. They locked him in the room with my husband. Chief Goode came after that, and I went downstairs and talked to him. My lawyer, or Mr. Dickey, came in with Chief Goode, and talked to him about it. Chief Goode said that I should see him; that I was his lawful wife. Then George Harlow unlocked the door and let me in.

"Q. Who went in first? You or he?—A. He did.

"Q. What happened after he went in?—A. He kept repeating over and over again: 'Tell her to get out of here. Tell her you don't want her. Tell her you have renounced her. Tell her to get out.'

"Q. Who was he talking to?—A. My husband.

"Q. And what happened?—A. I said: 'Dick, we have come over to have Doctor Rutherford talk to you and see what we can do for you; to take you to a hospital where you can get lots of care and attention.' George Harlow was repeating all the time: 'Tell her to get out. Tell her you don't want her. Tell her you want to stay here.'

"Q. Proceed.—A. So I asked him if he wanted to go with me to the hospital. He said: 'I want to stay right here.'

"Q. What else did he say, if you recall?—A. He said: 'You know I have renounced you. I have gone back to the church, and I am going to stay here.'

"Q. Was that the last of the conversation?—A. Yes.

"Q. And did you go out and go home?—A. Yes; after he said he was going to stay there, we turned and left the room and on home.

"Q. Did you ever see him again while he was alive?—A. I never did.

"Q. When did he die?—A. September 17, 1923.

"Q. Did the family send you any word of it?—A. Absolutely no.

"Q. How did you hear it?—A. I heard it through Mrs. Nichols. I was called at my office."

There is ample evidence here to support the charge of alienation of the husband's affections, and there is ample evidence from the conduct of the defendants that they were animated by malice toward the plaintiff. If there is any other evidence necessary to establish the motives of the defendants and their hostility to the plaintiff and their intention to sever every tie between this husband and wife, it may be found in the fact that John Harlow had taken a policy of $5,000 prior to his marriage. Under the terms of this policy, he had a right to change the beneficiary at will. His mother, Rose Harlow, was originally named as beneficiary, but, after his marriage, he changed the beneficiary to "Gladys Cowles Harlow, my wife." Five days after he was taken to the home of his family in Alexandria, the beneficiaries were changed to Rose Harlow, Lillian Harlow Green, Lillian Harlow McGinnis, Mrs. Gladys Cowles Harlow, George A. Harlow. About a month later than that, the beneficiaries were again changed, his wife, Gladys Cowles Harlow, being eliminated entirely, and the beneficiaries named as Rose Harlow, Lillian Harlow Green, Mary E. Harlow, Lillian Harlow McGinnis, George A. Harlow, Mrs. Richard H. Hartigan, Mary V. Harlow, Robert McGinnis, Rev. Louis Schmidt, and Rev. Lawrence Kelley; the latter two being Roman Catholic priests.

After his marriage the premiums on this policy were paid by the earnings of the plaintiff. Plaintiff's husband opened accounts at the different stores in Washington for her, never putting any limit on the amount of credit she might use. A year or two after their marriage, when they had finished paying for their furniture, a separate savings account was opened in which her earnings were deposited. When he was taken to Alexandria there was $936 in this account. On September 8 George Harlow wrote a letter to the manager of the hotel in which plaintiff's apartment was and signed her husband's name to it, notifying him that Harlow would not be responsible for any debt contracted in connection with his apartment. On the same day he wrote in the Alexandria home letters to every Washington house with which Harlow had given the plaintiff credit, notifying them not to give further credit to his wife. Four days after they got him to the Alexandria house George Harlow drew to his own order a check on the savings account for $700.

So that, not only did the defendants utterly destroy the happy marital relations existing between this husband and wife at a time when the husband especially needed the care that only a wife can give, but they heaped grievous insult upon the wife because she would not yield to their wishes and absent herself from her husband, and, in addition, they absorbed by one means or another in six weeks over $6,000 which would have gone to the wife, the plaintiff, upon the death of her husband, but for their interference. They either themselves parceled out among themselves or induced this dying man to parcel among them (with the exception of Edwin Harlow), to the exclusion of the wife, a $5,000 life-insurance policy in which she was named as sole beneficiary; they dissipated two bank accounts aggregating over $1,400, and in addition to this the mother received and appropriated to her own use $500 which the husband's employers paid over to her after her son's death, and to which, of course, the wife was legally entitled. The plaintiff's credit at the stores where she had had credit was cut-off, and the manager of the apartment where she lived was informed that the husband would not be responsible for rent. When her husband died, his wife was not informed of his death, while his divorced wife was, and was present just before or at his death. All of which shows that these defendants, because they did not recognize the second marriage of their son and brother, had resolved to sever every vestige of the marital relation legally existing between him and his second wife, and to absorb and dissipate his property so that she could not get any benefit from it during the husband's lifetime or after his death.

These facts, which have not been and can not be denied, throw a flood of light upon the motives which stirred these defendants into action, who set up their beliefs above the law of the land, which they undertook to nullify, and they strongly tend to corroborate the charge of alienation.

(2) Counsel insist that defendants had a right, if they entertained an honest belief that the husband's second marriage was morally wrong, sinful, and contrary to the Word of God or the tenets of their religion, and for that reason endangered his eternal welfare, to express that opinion to their brother.

It is not applicable in a case where the facts are as they appear in this case, even under the guise that parents and brothers and sisters have superior privileges in the giving of advice to children and to brothers and sisters.

(3) It appears to us, therefore, that the evidence of the plaintiff clearly establishes the conspiracy to alienate the affections of the husband from the wife, the plaintiff; that it clearly establishes the fact that his affections were alienated, and it is also clear from all the facts of the case that the conduct of the defendants was the result of legal malice toward the plaintiff. The court might well have predicated an instruction on the testimony of the plaintiff and the witnesses who corroborated her, and instructed the jury that, if they believed from the evidence that this testimony was true, they should find for the plaintiff. If the jury believed the evidence introduced on behalf of the plaintiff, there could have been no other verdict than one for the plaintiff.

2. It is contended by counsel for defendants that the verdict was excessive, and tainted with passion and prejudice; and

3. That the remittitur required by the court in the amount of the verdict was insufficient.

(4) It is only necessary to recall as narrated above the evidence which supports this verdict to justify the assertion that the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict, not only for actual, but for vindictive, damages. If the evidence of the plaintiff is true, it proved a deliberate and wanton assault, not only on the individual marital rights of the plaintiff but upon the security and sanctity of the American home by despoiling it of the law's protection when the law of the land runs counter to religious belief. The jury also had a right to consider, in assessing punitive damages, that the plaintiff was deprived of the proceeds of the life-insurance policy, which had belonged to her, of the funds in the savings bank, and of various other funds heretofore mentioned, and it had the right to consider that an innocent and devoted wife was deprived of her husband, and grossly insulted and humiliated on numerous occasions. Under such circumstances, the plaintiff was entitled to a substantial verdict.

(6) The evidence with reference to the change of beneficiaries in the life-insurance policy of the husband was objected to, but, as has been heretofore stated, this evidence was permissible to show the attitude of the defendants toward the plaintiff, and it was also proof of the success of the defendants' efforts to alienate the husband's affections, if he himself changed the beneficiaries, which they say he did. It shows that what his prior love had provided for the welfare of his wife a changed mind deprived her of.

We think the jury was justified in finding against the defendant, Mrs. Lena Harlow Hartigan. Although she lived in Washington, she was in very close touch with all that was going on in the home at Alexandria; she told the plaintiff that she thought her husband should give her up and go back to the church; she visited the brother quite frequently in Washington before he went to Alexandria, and was alone with him for a whole afternoon in his apartment there. She was very positive that the marriage of divorced persons was unlawful and not to be recognized, and, when the husband had reached the point where he decided to renounce his wife, Mrs. Hartigan phoned the plaintiff to come over to Alexandria on September 1, reminding her that she was to go over there after 6 upon that day. It will also be recalled that, immediately upon entering her husband's room in Alexandria on that occasion, without any preliminary remarks he stated to her, "Pet, it is all over. I have renounced you and gone back to the church." The facts in connection with this visit show clearly that the only object in getting the plaintiff to Alexandria on this occasion was to receive first hand the renunciation from her husband.

We think that this is sufficient to connect Mrs. Hartigan with the other defendants in bringing about the alienation of the affections of the husband.

The jury by their verdict found damages for the plaintiff in the sum of $20,000. So far as the remittitur is concerned, the court, in the exercise of its judicial discretion, reduced the amount of the recovery from $20,000 to $13,500. We do not think, in view of all the circumstances of this case, that this was error. The greater part of the recovery must have been for punitive damages, and, as such, it constitutes a substantial recovery against defendants of moderate means.

Upon the whole case, we think the judgment of the trial court should be amended by including therein the defendant Lena Harlow Hartigan with the other defendants, Rose Harlow, George Harlow, Lillian Harlow Green, and Mary D. Harlow, and, as so amended, that it be affirmed.

Amended and affirmed.

No one will contend that this opinion of the Supreme Court is political propaganda or an appeal to religious prejudice.

It is a cold-blooded condemnation by the court of the Catholic notion that their ideas about Protestant marriage and divorce are above the law of the land.

Al Smith is Roman Catholic. He had been commended by the Pope for his loyalty to the teachings of that organization.

When his son was recently married by a lawful official of the State of New York under a lawful license issued by that State, Al required the young man to be married again by a Roman Catholic priest in order to be "properly" married. He did not recognize the validity of a marriage declared valid by the law of the land until his son was married again by a priest. Al did what Catholics do in matters of that kind. He put his Catholic notions above the law of the land. That's what he will do if he is elected President.

Cardinal Hayes's missionary magazine for October says: "Watch and see! America is going to become pro-Catholic all at once. * * * This change may take place early in the administration of Smith as President—Democratic President of the United States."

Make America Catholic by making Al Smith President. That's the program. Cardinal Hayes says so. It took England 500 years to throw off the Catholic yoke once a Catholic was made King. When England finally threw off the Catholic yoke they wrote in their constitution that no Roman Catholic should ever be King of the British Empire, and that is the written law of England and the unwritten law of America to-day. (See Birmingham News editorial, July 4, 1924.)

What's the use in getting under the yoke anyway! We have a great Protestant American running for President.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a statement showing the amount of United States gift to Europe, $332,261,750, in 1929.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES GIFT TO EUROPE $332,261,750 IN 1929

American taxpayers are making an outright donation of $332,261,750 to 10 European nations in 1929, through debt remission. This money is included in the American budget and raised through taxation. The benefits of this gift are paid by American taxpayers and enjoyed by the taxpayers of the 10 nations.

Here is the amount of the gift to Europe in 1929:

Great Britain	$55,325,000
Italy	85,935,000
France	171,065,000
Belgium	14,847,650
Jugoslavia	2,500,000
Finland, Hungary, Poland, Latvia, Lithuania, and Estonia (total)	2,589,100

Czechoslovakia, Rumania, and other nations also are receiving donations.

During the 62-year funding period the total American gift to Europe will amount to $8,864,189,750.

Mr. President, the statement I ask to have placed in the RECORD shows that the people of the United States are taxed $332,261,750, which our Government gives to European countries in 1929 through debt remission. This has been brought about during the Coolidge administration by Congress approving the recommendations of the Foreign Debt Commission, which gave hundreds of millions to these countries in their debt settlements with us. The United States must pay interest on the bonds for the money we loaned these countries at a much higher rate than what we charge those countries interest on what is due us. We charge no interest on some of these debts. What we give these countries this year amounts to a tax of nearly $3 for each person in the United States. These debt settlements, that amount to hundreds of millions we gave these countries in settlements, will be a heavy tax on our people for many years.

Mr. President, I am glad that I voted against all these debt settlements. I do not believe it was right for us to do so. I believe I was the first Senator to introduce a resolution declaring that we would not discount any part of these European debts owed to us. I did not believe we were acting in good faith in giving them millions which we had loaned them from money our Government had raised from the sale of bonds to our people.

LOAD LINES FOR AMERICAN VESSELS

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to call up the conference report on Senate bill 1781, to establish load lines for American vessels.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1781) to establish load lines for American vessels, and for other purposes.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the matter before the Senate is the question of the adoption of the conference report on the so-called load line bill. I think I should make a brief statement. There may be several Senators who are now present who were not here last evening.

The situation is that the Senate passed a load line bill applying only to the ships engaged in foreign trade. It was thought by the committee that the language was clear to except the Great Lakes also, although that was not stated in specific terms. The House sent the bill back to us with amendments which extend the jurisdiction or the terms of the bill to cover the coastwise trade, with certain exceptions from that trade. The conferees have agreed upon the bill substantially as it passed the Senate. In other words, while the House struck out the word "foreign" which the Senate had in the bill, the House conferees have receded from that amendment and restored the word "foreign," so that accordingly it applies only to vessels in the foreign trade. The House in section 9 covered certain portions of the coastwise trade, but the House conferees have receded unqualifiedly from that amendment.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, let me be clear on that matter now. The Senator has said that the House has receded and that the word "foreign" is eliminated from the bill?

Mr. JONES. No; the word "foreign" is restored to the bill.

Mr. COPELAND. Very well.

Mr. JONES. Yes; the word "foreign" is restored to the bill, and section 9, which was inserted by the House, is omitted, so that leaves the entire coastwise trade eliminated from the terms of the bill. The bill as it is now reported by the conferees covers substantially the ground that the Senate provided for; in other words, the Senate bill is returned to the Senate practically with an agreement upon the part of the House to accept it. That is all that is asked in the adoption of the conference report. I will say this, in order to make it perfectly clear. The language of the Senate bill did not apply specifically to the Great Lakes. It was generally understood that they were not included. The bill as it came from the House provided specifically in section 9 that it shall not apply to the Great Lakes. Eliminating section 9, in order to make sure that the bill would not apply to the Great Lakes, the conferees inserted in the first part of the bill "the Great Lakes excepted," which makes the exemption perfectly clear.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, this is a very dangerous bill; and lest some one should think that I am alone in this opinion, I want to read in a few moments what Judge DAVIS, of Tennessee, said in the House on yesterday, expressing a view which was shared, apparently, by Mr. BLAND, of Virginia. Anybody who has an interest in human life must believe in making the vessels traveling the seas as safe as may be. There is no reason why this bill should be limited only to vessels engaged in foreign trade. It is just as important to have the proposed law apply to vessels of all descriptions traversing the sea.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from New York?

Mr. COPELAND. Of course.

Mr. JONES. I agree with the Senator with reference to the purpose of the load line to protect life at sea; and I also agree with the Senator that the law should go as far as possible; but if we can not succeed in having it go as far as we would like to have it go, and if we can go a way in that direction, it is better, I think, to go part way than not to go at all.

I want to suggest to the Senator from New York with reference to Judge DAVIS and Representative BLAND—I have the very highest regard for those gentlemen; I do not think there is any difference in their views and mine—that when we signed the first report they agreed to what we have reported here, and they joined in that conference report; but we also put in a resolution directing the Secretary of Commerce to investigate the coastwise trade and recommend to Congress such legislation as should be deemed wise. We were all for that, and these two gentlemen especially so.

Mr. COPELAND. What became of that?

Mr. JONES. I am going to tell the Senator in just a moment. That was put into the bill as reported by the conferees. Some one, however, made a point of order against the conference report in the House on account of this item, and it went out. All of the conferees were in favor of it, so far as that is concerned, but when it went out, of course, the conferees could do nothing further with reference to it. That was the sole reason, I think, why Representative BLAND and Representative DAVIS did not join in the second conference report. They were very much disappointed in that provision going out, as we all were, so far as that is concerned.

I recognize that the main argument for a load line is to protect life, and I think there is just as much reason for the protection of life on coastwise vessels, especially those engaged in the intercoastal trade, and so on, as there is in the foreign trade. All of our committee were in favor of that; but we were confronted with a situation as to whether we would have partial legislation or none at all.

If the Senator from New York will permit me further, here is the difference in the situation with reference to the foreign trade and the coastwise trade: For many years the maritime countries of the world, and especially Great Britain, having load-line requirements have been protesting against our not having load lines and have been threatening to stop our ships from entering their ports unless they do have load lines, either conforming to our own law or conforming to theirs. It has only been by the persistent effort, one might say, the pleading, of our State Department that they have refrained from putting their threat into effect. That is a strong point it seems to me for extending the load line law to the foreign trade, even if we do not extend it to the coastwise trade. There is going to be a conference on the means to promote safety of life at sea. Our delegates are going to that conference, which is to be held this summer; and we would be in a very peculiar attitude if we should go to that conference and its members should say to us, "You have been putting off from year to year the provision for the establishment of a load line on vessels in the foreign trade; you have not done anything to protect or insure or render safe life at sea." That is now the main distinguishing future between the necessity of extending the load line law to vessels engaged in foreign trade and those which are engaged in the domestic trade.

If we were not confronted with that situation, I would say all vessels ought to be dealt with at the same time. However, we hope to build up our merchant marine, especially in the foreign trade. In the coastwise trade our vessels, of course, have a monopoly. In the foreign trade we have competitors from all over the world, and especially from Great Britain, and very naturally so. It seems to me that we have reached a very critical point with reference to extending the load-line legislation at least to our foreign shipping, because adverse regulations may be put into effect in some foreign countries very soon. I would also say if some of our competitors on the seas for the foreign trade felt that they could retard our shipping development by requiring us to comply with their load-line legislation they would not hesitate to do it, and could not be blamed for doing so. And that might have a very injurious effect upon the development of our merchant marine.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. Will the Senator from Washington permit me to make an inquiry?

Mr. JONES. The Senator from New York has the floor.

Mr. COPELAND. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BURTON. As I understand, the Great Lakes are exempted from the provisions of this load line bill?

Mr. JONES. They are; the bill does not apply to them.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, before I say anything more about this bill I wish to pay a tribute to the Senator from Washington. In my work regarding the merchant marine and all other matters relating to commerce I have had the most intimate contacts with the Senator from Washington, and I regard him as one of the fairest and ablest and most generous and far-seeing of all the Senators in this body, and I am always embarrassed when I find myself in opposition to him. I know, however, that I am not really in opposition to the sentiment of his heart, for he feels, and has already stated to-day, that if he could have his way he would have this law apply to all ships. So I know the Senator from Washington will understand that in my attitude in this matter there is nothing personal. I am taking this position because of the great steamship lines of my city, which, as the Senator knows, are in bitter opposition to the present arrangement of the bill.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a suggestion there?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes.

Mr. JONES. I have no criticism to make of the steamship association—I take it the Senator refers generally to that association and those who are members of it—but I really can not understand their attitude. They did not present any opposition to the passage of the Senate bill in the Senate. I do not remember ever receiving, either when the bill was pending or after it passed, any suggestion of opposition to the bill. The present peculiar attitude of the steamship association is strange to me inasmuch as the conference report accepts the very provisions that the Senate passed almost a year ago, to which the steamship association made no objection whatever when it was being considered and has made no opposition since until this conference report comes in.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, in view of the further embarrassing fact that, as is well known to the Senate, I am in opposition to the bill which will come up when the consideration of the pending matter shall have been concluded, I must justify my present position. I do not care to be charged with attempting to filibuster on the radio bill by extending my remarks in relation to the pending conference report, and I am sure the Senator from Washington will bear me out that what I am saying would be justified even if there were no radio bill.

To go further in the matter I want the Senate to know how the men in the House felt about this bill. Judge DAVIS was a member of the conference committee, was he not?

Mr. JONES. He was.

Mr. COPELAND. And was Mr. BLAND also a member of the conference committee?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. Judge DAVIS and Mr. BLAND were both members of the conference committee on the part of the House, and they refused to sign the report. In a moment I am going to read what Judge DAVIS said yesterday in the House about it. The bill, as it is now before us, if it were enacted into law, would apply only to vessels in the foreign trade. Those in the coastwise service, those ships going through the Panama Canal, those barges loaded with lumber coming from the great Northwest down the west coast and through the Panama Canal to New York and Boston, would not be affected by the terms of the bill. It applies only to ships that cross the ocean.

I would have no particular objection to that from the standpoint of this discussion if it were not for the fact that a good many of our ships which most of the time are engaged in the foreign trade are for a part of the time employed in the coastwise service. It stands to reason that where there is marked upon a ship a broad white load line indicating if that line is level with the surface of the water the ship is loaded to its full capacity, and if the ship is so heavily loaded that that line is sunken beneath the surface of the water out of sight the vessel is overloaded.

You can see, Mr. President, that how much load a ship can carry makes a great difference in its position upon the seas. If the vessel is all the time near shore, and in time of storm or stress at sea may scurry to cover, it can carry a heavier load. It is proper for it to carry a heavier load, because if storm approaches it can go to a safe haven. On the other hand, where a vessel is going out upon the wide expanses of the ocean, we must make certain that that vessel is not overloaded or sailing under conditions which may make for disaster. If any Member of the Senate has been in a storm at sea, he knows how terrifying it is, and what the conditions are.

Mr. SACKETT. Is the Senator interested only in safety at sea or in the competition between vessels? Which is the point?

Mr. COPELAND. Both.

Mr. SACKETT. The Senator is talking about safety at sea. Does he not think that all classes of vessels that travel the sea, whether they are steamships or whether they are barges, ought to be included, if we are going to include anything?

Mr. COPELAND. I do.

Mr. SACKETT. The Senator would not want the bill to pass if barges that ply upon the ocean were excluded from the load-line requirements?

Mr. COPELAND. No.

Mr. SACKETT. I think we can agree on that. That is not what the House bill provided. They left out the barges.

Mr. COPELAND. They did; and the barges ought not to be left out. If there is one type of vessel that goes upon the waters that should be safeguarded it is the barge, because if the Senator has seen these barges carrying lumber or coal or iron or something else loaded down to the very decks of the boats, so that they are washed by the seas, he will agree that that is a crime against humanity.

Mr. SACKETT. If the Senator pleases, neither the Senate bill nor the House bill included the load line on barges; so there was nothing on which the conference committee could include that in its report. We must either take the things that are in the House bill or take the things that are in the Senate bill. If barges can not be included, I think the Senator ought to be willing to say that the bill that limits the load-line requirements to foreign vessels is the best we can get under the circumstances.

Mr. COPELAND. I am very sorry that my genial and beloved friend from Kentucky, usually so accurate, has failed to read that the conference report writes into this bill:

> This act shall not apply to vessels operating exclusively on the Great Lakes or to barges otherwise coming within the provisions of this act or to lumber schooners operating to and from territory contiguous to the United States.

Mr. SACKETT. I do not think that affects it.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I understood the Senator to say that the conferees wrote that in. The Senator is mistaken. That was an amendment put in by the House.

Mr. COPELAND. I do not care, if the Senator will permit me, whether it was put in by the conferees or by the House or by an act of Providence. It is in the bill, is it not?

Mr. JONES. It was in the bill.

Mr. COPELAND. It is in the bill that is now before us, is it not?

Mr. JONES. Not in the conference report. That is, it is eliminated. The House receded from that amendment entirely. That is the second amendment from which the House receded; and I might say to the Senator that one reason that led to the recession is that that does not extend the load-line legislation to barges. It takes them out from under the other terms of the bill, and we were advised that if they were taken out we would have all sorts of discussions, and we would not get any legislation during the session.

Mr. COPELAND. Let us be clear about this, Mr. President.

Mr. JONES. Yes; I know we all want to be clear.

Mr. COPELAND. Let us disregard names of conference reports, and whether the bill passed this way or the other way in the House and in the Senate. Does this matter, if we should agree to it, apply the load line to barges?

Mr. JONES. No; it does not apply to anything in the coastwise trade.

Mr. COPELAND. It does not apply to anything except foreign-going vessels, does it?

Mr. JONES. Vessels in the foreign trade—that is right.

Mr. COPELAND. All right. Now, let me say to the Senator from Kentucky that this bill applies only to vessels in the foreign trade.

Mr. SACKETT. That is what we tried to limit it to——

Mr. COPELAND. Well, you succeeded.

Mr. SACKETT. Because we could not get an agreement to apply it to every vessel that flies the flag and does the trade of the United States.

Mr. COPELAND. In other words, we are spending our time and the time of the Senate on a bill which has no use in the world.

Mr. SACKETT. I beg the Senator's pardon; that is not the case. It is very important that we have it apply to foreign trade on account of this conference that is coming up, giving us a standing in the trade of the world.

Mr. JONES. If the Senator will pardon me, if there is any benefit in having a load line, I agree that it applies to all, both coastwise and foreign.

Mr. COPELAND. Of course.

Mr. JONES. But if we can not get it in all, then it is still a benefit if it applies to vessels in the foreign trade. So there is that much benefit that we get out of it, in addition to the suggestion to which I referred a while ago, that we may have a serious situation confronting us with the other nations in the foreign trade unless we do something of this kind that will affect our own merchant marine.

Mr. COPELAND. And the serious situation to which the Senator refers would be a demand on the part of Lloyds and other insurance companies that the English standard shall be applied if we fail to enact legislation providing for a load line?

Mr. JONES. That the English Government will insist that it be applied to our ships entering their ports.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HASTINGS in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. COPELAND. I do.

Mr. NEELY. Does the Senator from New York prefer the enactment of the law proposed by the Senate bill, to the defeat of the measure as amended by the House?

Mr. COPELAND. I prefer to have the bill defeated rather than to have it pass in its present form.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I am impelled to inform the able Senator from New York that if the bill is burdened with the House amendments it shall not pass between now and 12 o'clock next Monday, when this Congress will expire.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I will yield to the Senator from New Jersey in just a moment. I want to have the Senator's attitude clear. The Senator from West Virginia says that in its present form the bill can not pass?

Mr. NEELY. That is not my position. I have no objection to the adoption of the conference report. But I shall resist every effort that may be made to restore the House amendments, which, if adopted, would be injurious to the coal industry of West Virginia.

Mr. COPELAND. Let me say to the Senator that he should do all he can to pass this conference report, because, as put before us, it suits him to a T. This is exactly the way the Senator wants it.

The Senator should give his full support to the Senator from Washington, because, if he succeeds in having this conference report adopted, his position will be sustained.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, the Senator from West Virginia will always support the Senator from Washington or any other Senator in his endeavors to serve the constituents of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. COPELAND. Undoubtedly that is true.

Mr. NEELY. Positively; without evasion or mental reservation.

Mr. SACKETT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. Just one minute, and I will. I must yield first to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I have great sympathy for the position of opposition to many of the decisions and policies of the existing Radio Commission. I do not know that I am not in sympathy to a great extent with the opposition to this bill; but I should like to have the Senator, in a few words—he has followed it as a member of the committee, and I have not—give his opinion of what would happen should the bill fail. Is the Senator discussing the radio bill?

Mr. COPELAND. No; but I have no objection to the Senator's discussing it.

Mr. EDGE. The radio bill being the unfinished business, I naturally assumed the Senator from New York was confining himself to the unfinished business.

Mr. COPELAND. That is my embarrassment in this particular discussion on the load line bill, because I fear the Senator will get the impression that I am doing this to affect the legislation upon the radio bill; and I am glad to have the Senator ask questions about that. I might as well answer them now.

Mr. EDGE. I should like the Senator, if he will, to answer the question, because it seems to me appropriate, in view of the fact that the radio legislation is the unfinished business.

Mr. COPELAND. I shall be glad to answer the question.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the able Senator from New Jersey explain why he would indulge in the violent assumption that one speaking in the Senate would address himself exclusively to the matter supposed to be before this body? [Laughter.]

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, to answer the Senator from New Jersey—because we might as well do that now; we must do it later in the day, anyhow—may I say to the Senator from New Jersey that two years ago we passed a law establishing a Radio Commission; and it was understood that for the period of one year that commission should have both administrative duties and judicial duties. At the end of the year all the administrative duties were to be taken over by the Department of Commerce, where they had been, and where they are now, and the commission was to be simply an appellate body to take care of all controversial matters and all matters appealed to it. So if the bill dies, as it should, unless it is amended, we will be back where we intended to be in the first place. Last year we extended that year another year, and it is proposed now to extend it still another year; but the business of the radio will be taken care of by the board acting as an appellate board, and the administrative features will be taken care of in the Department of Commerce.

Mr. EDGE. That was my understanding. I just wanted it confirmed by the distinguished Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. Let me say to the Senator that he need have no anxiety; the great cause of radio will not suffer in the least. The business will be taken care of exactly as we contemplated under the passage of the bill two years ago.

Mr. SACKETT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me now for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SACKETT. On the matter of this conference report, I feel that the only question we can decide at all is whether we will apply this load-line requirement to foreign vessels.

Mr. COPELAND. That is it.

Mr. SACKETT. If we do not agree to the conference report, we shall have to go into the conference that is to be held in Europe without any standing on the load-line question. If we do agree to the conference report at this session, we stand very much better for the shipowners of our whole country, because we are in a position to make proper arguments at that conference.

Mr. COPELAND. Just a moment. Will the Senator explain just exactly what will be taken up in that conference?

Mr. SACKETT. I would rather leave that to the Senator from Washington, because he is much more familiar with it.

Mr. COPELAND. Let us find out, so that we will know exactly what is to be taken up in the conference.

Mr. SACKETT. I will state to the Senator from Washington that the Senator from New York wants an explanation of what the European conference of shipowners is going to take up and why it would be a better thing for us to have a load line when we go into the conference.

Mr. JONES. I can not give the Senator very much information about that. I understand there is to be what might be termed an international conference the coming summer upon methods and means of promoting safety at sea, and we are going to have delegates there. It would occur to me that our delegates would be in a very peculiar position if they should go over there and we should have failed in the meantime to do what all the countries of the world seem to think is necessary—establish a load line for vessels, especially those in the foreign trade.

Mr. COPELAND. Is the conference limited wholly to vessels engaged in foreign trade?

Mr. JONES. As I understand, it is described as an international conference to promote safety at sea. I take it they would have nothing particular to do with problems affecting our coastwise trade. That is something we deal with ourselves.

Mr. COPELAND. I do not know whether the Senator is to be a delegate or not. Are the delegates appointed?

Mr. JONES. I am not going to be a delegate. The delegates are to be appointed. I would like to be, I might say, but it would not be possible for me to make a trip of that kind this summer. Furthermore, I consider that a matter really for experts.

Mr. COPELAND. I will say, in the first place, that the Senator is an expert. Does the President appoint the delegates?

Mr. JONES. I think so.

Mr. COPELAND. I am going to ask the President to appoint the Senator from Washington, but since he is not yet appointed I want to say this to him——

Mr. JONES. I would have to decline an appointment of that kind.

Mr. COPELAND. If the Senator were in that conference, he would be ashamed to say that the United States of America had declined to place the load line upon the vessels of the United States, because it would interfere with the Coal Trust, and the Steel Trust, and the Lumber Trust; and the delegate would be ashamed to admit that the Congress of the United States gravely discussed the question of a load line for foreign vessels and excluded those which operate in our own waters. The only excuse given for it is the fear that the Government of Great Britain may demand, as to foreign-going American ships, that it shall examine those vessels entering the ports of Great Britain and demand that there shall be a load line marked upon them.

Mr. SACKETT rose.

Mr. COPELAND. Just a moment. The delegate from the United States would have to say, "We only did this in fear of what might happen on this side of the water." But the sailors who ply the seas upon vessels in our own waters are to have their lives and health subjected to the dangers of the sea, because the great, powerful trusts interested in owning these barges and schooners will not submit to this life-saving precaution.

Now I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. SACKETT. Mr. President, there are certain advantages which can come to ships that travel to foreign ports by reason of a load line, in the way of safety. The Senator and I are agreed, I judge from his remarks, that what we would like to see is a load-line requirement that would apply to all vessels of every type that traverse the seas, whether they are foreign or domestic. The situation which develops is this: That in neither of the two bills that were presented and passed in the House and the Senate is there any provision which would require a load line upon the vast number of barges that ply this coast, and which are equally important. Those barges compete with coastwise shipping, and if we are to apply the load line to one class we should in fairness to the trade apply it to the other. Some of the Senator's own constituents have taken that position and taken it justly.

As barges are not included in either bill, there is no possibility of bringing in a report that would cover all kinds of coastwise trade. There would be a great advantage, as to the foreign ships, in having it, putting us in the position, when our experts go abroad to deal with the international question, on an equality with foreign countries. If, by defeating this bill, the only thing we can accomplish is to deprive them of that advantage, it seems to me the Senator ought to consider this partial legislation, which is beneficial, and in the next session of Congress I will be glad to join with him in getting legislation that shall apply to all kinds of traffic in the coastwise trade. But a defeat of this now would not gain that additional advantage, because the conferees could not put it into this conference report.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, with that explanation, will not the able and amiable Senator from New York permit us to adopt the conference report?

Mr. COPELAND. I am very much obliged for the kind words of my genial friend from West Virginia. Whenever I see him and talk with him and hear him in the Senate, I can not understand the shortsightedness of his State. He ran thousands and thousands and thousands of votes ahead of his ticket, but because of the avalanche down there he was not reelected. He should have been reelected by that fine State of West Virginia, which never was more ably represented in the Senate than by the Senator, my distinguished friend, Mr. NEELY. He has never failed to protect the rights and interests of his State. Until this morning the only thing I have ever had against him was that he defeated some very beneficent coal legislation. As a result of the debate on that question he advertised West Virginia coal so that there is not a man from the North Pole to Byrd's expedition in the south who does not know that West Virginia coal is the best coal that ever came out of the earth.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, the Senator from New York has again proved his extraordinary ability to express sublime thoughts in language that is "like apples of gold in pictures of silver." Will he not now permit the Senate to adopt the conference report?

Mr. COPELAND. The request of the Senator from West Virginia demonstrates again his devotion to his great State, because if the coal-carrying barges are not required to have load lines in order that the sailors may be protected, the profits on West Virginia coal will be greatly enhanced.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, sailors do not man coal barges.

Mr. COPELAND. When we get to the radio bill, I expect to speak about the wonderful development in the radio art, so that even ships can be operated by radio. I will withdraw, therefore, the term "sailors," and say "persons."

Mr. NEELY. The question of protecting human life is not involved in the question of applying load-line legislation to coal barges.

Mr. COPELAND. What the Senator means is that human life is not to be considered when the profits on coal are involved.

Mr. NEELY. I am quite sure that the Senator from New York does not believe that I mean that. But I contend that the question of the safety of human life is not involved in the question of a load line on a coal barge. Those in charge of the movement of coal barges usually travel on the vessel by which the barges are propelled or towed.

Mr. COPELAND. There are not any little cabins on coal barges, where people live?

Mr. NEELY. Not to my knowledge.

Mr. COPELAND. Perhaps I may reply in the language of Mr. DAVIS, of the House, who said on yesterday:

> Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, every important nation on earth except the United States has long since enacted load-line legislation to protect all its citizens and their property against the overloading of ships by those who have more regard for a little more profit than for the lives of the seamen and of passengers and the property of the citizens.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, does not the Senator from New York observe that Mr. DAVIS was discussing ships while we are discussing coal barges? Ships transport passengers. Coal barges transport coal. Passenger ships should be made safe at any cost, because loss of life may result from the loss of a ship. But the loss of a coal barge does not involve the loss of life. Therefore, barges should not be subject to laws or rules designed solely to protect human life.

Mr. COPELAND. This bill would not apply to a scow which did not carry persons, so the Senator, after all, is not interested.

Mr. NEELY. The conference report does not make the load line applicable to barges, and I am not opposed to its adoption.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not had an opportunity to examine this bill; I have heard something about it, however, and I want to ask the Senator from New York if the bill applies to barges engaged only in coastwise trade or does it apply equally to barges engaged on our inland waterways?

Mr. COPELAND. If this conference report is adopted and the bill becomes a law, coastwise vessels and internal-waterway vessels would not be involved.

Mr. SIMMONS. Neither the coastwise nor the inland-waterway vessels?

Mr. COPELAND. Neither class. Of course, I must say to the Senator in all frankness that I do not like that provision of the bill. I do not want him to have any misapprehension of my position; but it does not apply to such vessels as he has mentioned.

Mr. SIMMONS. I would have nothing particular to say about the bill if it did apply to the coastwise trade, although I think it would be rather hasty legislation; but if it applied to inland barge transportation I should say it was a very bad bill. I had a conference with the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] before the bill went to conference, or at some stage at least, and made the objection which I have just made. I understand from him that the objection would not obtain against the bill now, as the conferees agreed upon it, and he now advises me that it does not.

Mr. JONES. It just applies to ships in foreign trade.

Mr. SIMMONS. There was one section which I thought might apply to it, but the Senator from Washington assures me that that section was eliminated.

Mr. NEELY. Let me refute the implication that failure to make load-line legislation applicable to coal barges will endanger human life; let me observe that no one ever read or heard of the overloading of a coal barge causing a death.

Mr. COPELAND. Let me say to the Senator in justification of his position that there is far less objection to the exclusion of coal barges than there is to the exclusion of the lumber schooner, and the Senator can see the reason for that, because there are sailors or men aboard the latter all the time. I think the position of the Senator is not an untenable one, and I would not fail to go to West Virginia to speak for him just because he happened to be against coal barges being included in the bill. That provision is much less offensive than other features in the bill.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator that my recollection is, as to coal carried upon the Mississippi River, that those barges are towed down in big fleets by small tugboats that merely keep them from the banks, and in most cases are left at place of destination and sold as junk if they can save 20 per cent of the value and not returned to the coal fields of Kentucky, West Virginia, and Ohio.

Mr. COPELAND. We have in the North River a great many barges that are engaged in carrying brick from our manufacturers up the river. Those are placed in a line and a towboat, which is a misnomer in this case, is in the rear of the line and pushes the line of boats. But on our barges there is a little cabin and people live on practically every one of them, because in that way they save rent, and so forth. But that is not particularly important.

Mr. NEELY. The Senator from New York knows that I would not support any legislation or action that would endanger the life or limb of those who toil.

Mr. COPELAND. I hasten to say that no man in the Senate has distinguished himself more by standing for human rights and human lives and human health than the Senator from West Virginia, one of the most humanitarian and kindly hearted Senators we have in the body.

Now, I will read Mr. DAVIS's statement. I am glad to do this because it fully justifies the position I am taking at this moment in opposition to the conference report. Judge DAVIS, of Tennessee, has been long in the House, a very highly respected Member of it. He and Mr. BLAND, of Virginia, another distinguished Member of the House, were managers appointed originally by the House to deal with the first conference report, which I think they signed, but when the conferees had a change of heart and brought in the last report under the instructions of their respective bodies——

Mr. JONES rose.

Mr. COPELAND. I will withdraw "change of heart."

Mr. JONES. Yes; the Senator does not mean that. There was no change of heart. They had to do the best they could.

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; and the Senator from Washington never will have a change of heart on anything having to do with human life, but he was under instructions of the Senate.

Mr. JONES. No; that was not the situation. We were not under instructions of the Senate. The provision incorporated in the place of section 9 was stricken out by the conferees the first time, but the language of a resolution was substituted for it.

Mr. COPELAND. Calling upon the Secretary of Commerce to investigate, and so forth.

Mr. JONES. Yes; and to recommend legislation.

Mr. COPELAND. That was a good resolution, I think.

Mr. JONES. I agree with the Senator. I think so, too. As a matter of fact, I want to say to the Senator, though I am not saying it with any authority, especially, even of the Department of Commerce, because that provision went out on a point of order, that I am satisfied the Commerce Department will investigate the matter very carefully and be prepared to recommend legislation during the next session. The conferees had no change of heart, as the Senator suggested, but the Senator withdrew the statement, of course.

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; I withdraw it.

Mr. JONES. But they were confronted with a point of order being sustained and the fact that they could not put anything of that kind in the bill.

Mr. COPELAND. I share with the Senator his feeling of regret that the bill did not continue to carry the language of the resolution giving to the Secretary of Commerce the authority to make an investigation. That should have been done. Now at this moment my judgment is that the report should be rejected and that the Senate should pass a resolution calling upon the Secretary of Commerce to make the recommendation.

Mr. JONES. We can do that without rejecting the conference report. We can still pass the resolution.

Mr. SIMMONS. Is the resolution a part of the conference report?

Mr. JONES. That went out in the House on a point of order.

Mr. SIMMONS. As well as the original provision?

Mr. JONES. The original provision went out in the second conference. There is nothing to prevent Congress from passing the resolution.

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly, if the conferees were prohibited by reason of the fact that a certain provision had been cut out on a point of order, they would have no authority to include in the conference report the language of the resolution which would authorize an investigation. That would have to be done in a separate resolution of the two bodies.

Mr. COPELAND. I think that is the fact. I would like to call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina that he must not feel, by reason of the fact that coastwise vessels are not specifically included in the bill, that all of them are exempt from its operations. There are a great many vessels, as the Senator from North Carolina knows, which are engaged in foreign traffic most of the time, but part of the time are engaged in coastwise traffic.

Mr. SIMMONS. Why, of course, and I am laboring under no such delusion as the Senator from New York implies, but I can realize, as he does, that a general provision in the bill might include coastwise traffic although it did not mention it specifically.

Mr. COPELAND. The vessels ordinarily in coastwise traffic that are occasionally in foreign service must have the load line. The significance of that is that when the vessel once has a load line marked upon it, a load line which is placed there with reference to foreign trade, if it then engages in coastwise work and carries a heavier load, which it will be justified in carrying, so that the load line is hidden from view by reason of the height of the water, and then if an accident would happen, it would be presumptive guilt of overloading on the part of the owners of the vessel.

Mr. SIMMONS. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. DAVIS said:

Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, every important nation on earth except the United States has long since enacted load-line legislation to protect all its citizens and their property against the overloading of ships by those who have more regard for a little more profit than for the lives of the seamen and of passengers and the property of the citizens. We have been trying for many years to enact a law of this kind, not only in the interest of safety of life and property but also in the interest of that large class of shipowners who do not want to overload their ships; in the interest of that class of shipowners who naturally do not want to have to compete with the unscrupulous operators who have no regard for life. Efforts along this line have been defeated—

Now remember this is not my language:

Efforts along this line have up to this time been defeated by that small element who have no regard for the safety of life and property, and who wish to continue loading their vessels beyond the line of safety.

We know that is the reason why these vessels, some of them in coastwise trade, coal-carrying, ore-carrying, and lumber-carrying vessels, have had no regard whatever, as Judge DAVIS said, for human life and why they ask to be exempt from the operation of this measure.

There are persons in this world who would crystallize the sweat of men into diamonds and rubies rather than to have an invasion of their money-making projects. They would even defeat legislation which makes for the preservation of human life. Judge DAVIS continues:

The Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries during the present session first reported out a bill applying a load line to all vessels going to sea of over 250 tons, whether they were operating in the foreign trade, in the coastwise trade, or on the Great Lakes. Then, as it was near the end of the session and opposition arose on the part of certain interests, and it appeared unlikely that we would be able to pass a load line bill which could be filibustered to death by a few Members of Congress, the committee, not because they had yielded their opinion—

"Not because they had yielded their opinion." That is exactly where my beloved friend from Washington stands; he has not yielded his honest opinion, but because a bill which was a just bill, which sought to protect human life everywhere on the seas, could not be enacted, there was a yielding to the demand.

Not because they thought it was legislatively or morally right—

They did not yield their opinion because they thought it was legislatively or morally right to pass a measure of this sort—but in the interest of expediency, reconsidered the bill and made certain specific exceptions, and we passed the bill through the House in that form.

Then Judge DAVIS goes on:

When it went to the Senate it developed that there was strenuous objection in the Senate.

Mr. President, this is a beautiful day, the sun shines brightly, and my advice to everybody who can get into the open air is to do so. If my colleagues who want to visit would take a walk across to the House Office Building or to the Library of Congress and enjoy the fresh air and sunshine they would benefit in health, their lives would be prolonged, and it would be easier for me to go on reading the remarks of Judge DAVIS.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I thought the Senator from New York wanted to convince Senators that he was right in the position he is taking, but now he is suggesting to them that they vacate the premises.

Mr. COPELAND. Of course, I want those who are in their seats to stay here, but if others want to visit on the side lines they could do it to much greater advantage to health and length of life if they did it in the open air.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield to me?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator give us some information as to about how long we may be excused? I have been here day and night for quite a while, and I am rather inclined to take his suggestion.

Mr. COPELAND. Has the Senator from Tennessee yet had his lunch?

Mr. McKELLAR. Not yet.

Mr. COPELAND. He will have plenty of time to get it now.

Mr. BARKLEY. I desire to know if that is an invitation?

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator may consider it such if he so desires.

Mr. HEFLIN. I wonder if the Senator from New York can give us any idea of what may happen to-night if he continues a long speech to-day?

Mr. COPELAND. Fortunately for me, since I am in opposition to the radio bill, I can spend some time to the profit of the country if I can help to defeat the pernicious measure which is before us. I send forward to the desk a telegram which I ask to have read, in order to show that I have ample justification for the position I take.

Mr. HEFLIN. Was the Senator from New York here night before last during the long session that lasted until nearly 3 o'clock?

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator from New York was here.

Mr. HEFLIN. All the time?

Mr. COPELAND. All the time.

Mr. HEFLIN. Does the Senator want to stay here all night to-night?

Mr. COPELAND. I hope we shall not do so.

Mr. HEFLIN. I think the Senator is in a fair way to bring about that kind of situation.

Mr. COPELAND. Does the Senator have any suggestion to make that would do away with it?

Mr. HEFLIN. I think if the Senator from New York would speak very vigorously on this conference report for about 15 minutes and then let us vote, it would be a solution of it.

Mr. COPELAND. Of this question?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the telegram sent to the desk by the Senator from New York.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

BUFFALO, N. Y., February 20, 1929.

Hon. ROYAL S. COPELAND,

Senator, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We are informed load line bill now pending includes Great Lakes and St. Lawrence. Such inclusion is absolutely unnecessary in our protected inland waters and will work serious hardship on shipping on Great Lakes, and such hardship will, of course, indirectly affect commerce of the State. Suggest you oppose passage of bill as now proposed.

BOLAND & CORNELIUS.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, may I interrupt there to say that the sender of that telegram is entirely misinformed?

Mr. COPELAND. The matter is taken care of, as the Great Lakes are exempted. Here is a telegram from the Dimon Steamship Corporation, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read, as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y., February 18, 1929.

Senator ROYAL S. COPELAND,

Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Strenuously opposed to passage of Senate bill 1781, load line regulation, reported out by Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, unless intercoastal carriers are also given same exemptions as coastwise barges and steam lumber schooners. Passage of bill in present form works gross discrimination against intercoastal steamers carrying lumber. Intercoastal vessels carrying lumber load approximately 25 per cent of their cargo on deck the same as coastwise steam lumber schooners, which are of the same general design as intercoastal carriers, only difference being smaller. We have never had a loss of any lumber, cargo, loss of life, or damage to vessels on account of carriage of deck load of lumber.

DIMON STEAMSHIP CORPORATION.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the Senator appreciates, I presume, that the sender of that telegram is also under a misconception.

Mr. COPELAND. If the Senator will be patient, we will have one that is not of that character.

Mr. JONES. I am patient; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. COPELAND. I ask the clerk to read the telegram from the Luckenbach Steamship Co., which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y., February 22, 1929.

Senator ROYAL S. COPELAND,

Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Understand Senate bill 1781, relating load-line regulation, passed House with amendments providing exemption to steam lumber schooners. This is gross discrimination to coastwise steamers in intercoastal trade carrying lumber from Pacific coast to Atlantic coast ports. Why should steam lumber schooners be permitted to sail with decks nearly under and we be required to observe arbitrary marks? At present we always sail with no less than 15-foot freeboard. We urge passage of original bill applying to foreign trade exclusively.

LUCKENBACH STEAMSHIP CO.

Mr. JONES. I suppose the Senator appreciates that that telegram expressly urges the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President——

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Edwards	King	Simmons

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a telegram received yesterday from the American Steamship Owners' Association, reading as follows:

The load line bill as now proposed, applying only to vessels engaged in foreign trade, will work a great hardship on many vessels which are from time to time engaged in foreign trade, but which also frequently go coastwise. We are opposed to the bill, and hope that it will not be passed if section 9, as proposed by conferees, is eliminated. We urge you to do everything possible to see that bill is not passed in present form.

AMERICAN STEAMSHIP OWNERS' ASSOCIATION.

Those vessels which are engaged exclusively in foreign trade should have a load line that coincides with the best thought of the experts of the world. I am glad there is to be a conference, and I hope our delegates will bring home from that conference a knowledge of the necessities of the sea as regards protection of passengers and sailors, in order that the United States may be at least on a par with the very best of foreign nations, and I should be glad if we were in the lead. I hope these delegates will come back filled with enthusiasm and a determination to pass through the Congress a real bill, and not an emasculated one such as we have before us now.

Fortunately for us and for those who travel upon our ships, if we do not proceed to enact legislation, they will force our ships into accepting this standard whether we want it or not; but this is not the way to accomplish what we want. By the passage of this bill, according to the testimony of those who talk about the conference abroad, we will go into that conference giving the impression, or seeking to convey the impression, that we have adopted a load line in this country, when that is not the case. We are simply throwing dust into the air. To change the figure, we are seeking simply to confuse the minds of people who read of legislative acts. We are seeking to give the impression that we are striving to protect human life, when, as a matter of fact, the great offenders against life and property are not the foreign-going vessels; they are the coastwise vessels, the barges and the schooners, which are specifically excepted from the provisions of the law by the bill before us.

That has been my own confident belief; but when I find such distinguished company as Judge DAVIS and Mr. BLAND, of the House, I know that the position taken to-day is the right one.

The committee, not because they had yielded their opinion, not because they thought it was legislatively or morally right, but in the interest of expediency—

In the interest of expediency!—

reconsidered the bill and made certain specific exceptions, and we passed the bill through the House in that form. When it went to the Senate it developed that there was strenuous objection in the Senate because of the exceptions we had made with respect to certain classes, and the bill went to conference.

Mr. President, listen to what Judge DAVIS said:

Every one of the House and of the Senate conferees favored the resolution which was adopted and which was in the first report of the House managers. We declared ourselves in favor of applying the load line to all ships, and that in the next Congress we would undertake to do that. But realizing that the friends of some of these interests could filibuster the bill to death we agreed upon and reported out the bill excepting the coastwise trade and the Great Lakes from the operations of the bill.

Mind you, for the sake of expediency the bill was reported out excepting the Great Lakes and the coastwise vessels; but the committee, made up of high-minded men, were utterly unwilling to permit the matter to rest there, and they did what it seems to me was a perfectly natural and proper thing to do, quoting now from Judge DAVIS again:

But realizing that the friends of some of these interests could filibuster the bill to death we agreed upon and reported out the bill excepting the coastwise trade and the Great Lakes from the operations of the bill, and substituting in lieu a section in which we directed the Secretary of Commerce to make an investigation and study of the advisability of applying this law to all classes of vessels and to make his report and recommendations to the next Congress.

That was fine. That was a splendid thing to do. The Senator from Washington nods his head in approval, as everyone must do who knows anything about this project.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I want to assure the Senator that I am just as earnestly in favor of doing that, even without that resolution; and I will join with the Senator, early in the next session, in preparing and trying to secure the passage of legislation going that far.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator; and permit me to suggest to him—because I am going to be pretty busy for a little while—that he prepare a resolution and put it in in this Congress asking the Secretary of Commerce to do this—a Senate resolution that will not have to go to the House—and then he will come forward next year with some material which we can use.

Mr. JONES. Would that aid the Senator in coming to a vote on the conference report?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; it would.

Mr. JONES. I will prepare that resolution right away.

Mr. COPELAND. It means a lot to me; and if I can have the assurance of the Senator from Washington, with his great influence, that he will present such a resolution, it will help me to leave the floor earlier than I otherwise could. I thank the Senator for his willingness to do this.

I shall continue now to read from the statement of Judge DAVIS, speaking now about this conference report, where there was an agreement for the sake of expediency that the coastwise vessels and barges and lumber schooners should be exempt from the provisions of the law, but that the Secretary of Commerce would "make an investigation and study of the advisability of applying this law to all classes of vessels" and make a report to the next session of Congress. Judge DAVIS said:

It came to the House in that form, signed by all of the conferees. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. ABERNETHY], who has been making a fight for the exclusion of barges, the most dangerous type of vessels of them all, made a point of order against the provision directing an investigation.

Mind you, Mr. President, I am reading from the RECORD the statement of Judge DAVIS. These are not my words. I want that clear. So a point of order was made against the provision directing an investigation. I want to make it clear now that I am quoting, and that this is not anything I am saying:

Naturally, he was afraid for an investigation to be made of the dangers with regard to barges and the necessity from the standpoint of human life of having the load line law apply to barges. So he made a point of order which the Chair saw proper to sustain.

I suppose, under the rules of the House, the Chair had to sustain that point of order.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. COPELAND. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. That point of order was made in the House, and that item was eliminated from the bill, but in conference, the conferees did the very remarkable and unusual thing of incorporating it in the conference report. When the report came to the Senate, I notified the Senator from Washington that I would raise the point of order here against the conference report, and the item was dropped out of the conference report in deference to that suggestion. So I do not think the Senator need bother himself any further about that. That is out of the way.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator has spoken plainly, and, of course, that is all right; but I was making it clear, when I spoke about a Member of the House, that I was reading from the RECORD. I did not wish to be put in the position of having done that on my own account. As the Senator has said, he would have raised the same point of order, and, of course, under our rules, it would have been sustained; and it is his absolute right, if he considers it proper, to raise that question.

Judge DAVIS further said:

> Now, the conferees have reported the bill back without that provision. I declined to sign the last conference report; so did my colleague the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND]; because, speaking for myself—and I assume it is his view also—I was not willing to make any further concessions to that class of people who are not only opposed to a law that would prevent them from overloading, loading beyond the line of safety, but also opposed to an investigation, inquiry, and report by the Department of Commerce.

Then Judge DAVIS further said:

> The American Steamship Owners' Association, composed of fifty-odd of the leading American steamship lines, operating in both the foreign and the coastwise trade, advocated load-line legislation. They advocated it as applicable to all ships, and said, "We are willing and anxious for it to be put on us, if you put it on our competitors." But now they are properly and logically objecting to the bill in its present form. They said, "We were not going to make any fight against a bill which contained a provision for a future investigation and report, with a promise of the consideration of the other classes of vessels in the next Congress, but," they said, "when those excepted classes put themselves in the attitude of even opposing a further investigation of the subject, we think the Congress is proposing to go too far, and we are protesting against the passage of this bill." I have a telegram, received from them this morning, in which they are bitterly protesting against the bill in its present form.
> Now, that is the situation with which we are confronted. I do not suppose I could, if I would, defeat this conference report; but I think it is wrong; I think it is discriminatory; I think it is unfair; and I think it is a yielding to some of the very interests who ought to have the load-line legislation apply to them, certainly as much, if not more, than the class to which we are proposing to apply it.

Mr. President, it is very apparent from the statement of Judge DAVIS, who apparently had the support of Mr. BLAND, of Virginia, that these members of the conference committee saw the unfairness and the inhumanity, if I may put it that way, of this proposed legislation.

I trust the Senator from Washington is preparing his resolution.

Mr. JONES. I will do so as soon as I can get my stenographer.

Mr. COPELAND. If we can have the assurance—and apparently we have obtained it—that the Secretary of Commerce will be called upon for a report as to the needs of the country regarding load-line legislation, I shall be satisfied. I am not satisfied to permit this legislation to be enacted without a conviction in my heart that this is to be the end of the load-line business. We must enact into law measures which will make for the safety of American sailors and seamen and the passengers on our ships, and we can never be certain of that condition unless we have proper legislation.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following Senate resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 345) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

> Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce is requested to make a comprehensive study of load-line legislation in the coastwise and intercoastal trade and the Great Lakes and all types of vessels, and to submit his report covering the same to the Senate during the month of December, 1929, and to accompany such report with a tentative draft of a bill to effectuate his recommendations.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am very much obliged to the Senator from Washington and to the Senate for passing the resolution. My conscience would not permit me to vote for any measure which in my opinion would postpone the time when we could have appropriate legislation which would really save human life, and I know that is the sentiment of the Senator from Washington. I know that he has been dissatisfied with what has been done. But now that the Senate has passed a resolution calling upon the Secretary of Commerce to make the investigation and present it to the Senate with a recommendation for legislation I have not anything more to say. I feel that the morning has been well spent. It would be a crime against life and happiness of our country to pass an emasculated bill solely as a sop to the public, giving the impression that American ships are safe, when as a matter of fact the load-line provision would apply only to vessels going into ports where they would not be permitted very much longer to land anyhow without a load line applied by themselves if not by our country. But now we have the promise and I know we will have the urgent support of the Senator from Washington in making effective the legislation.

Mr. JONES. I should have been very glad to do it, even without the passage of the resolution.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator and express my gratitude to the Senate. I apologize to the Senate for having taken so much of its time.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. We have been for many years trying to get a load-line measure enacted into law. Congress has had before it for 8 or 10 years measures to establish a load line. There has been objection by the coastwise people in some instances and by the barge people in some instances. Is it not well to make a start, even though the present bill applies only to ships in foreign trade? A little later on we may be able to do something that will further promote the safety of lives on barges and other vessels. But ought we not to make a start with it now and get such legislation as we can at this time?

I agree with the Senator that we must do something to insure safety of life at sea. The Vestris disaster and various other occurrences have made it, it seems to me, profoundly important that we should have legislation and regulations and otherwise promote the safety of life at sea. This is one step in that direction.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator. I am sorry the able Senator from Florida has not been here to hear the extended discussion we have had this morning. I would not be satisfied otherwise, and I would be on my feet for hours if need be to try to prevent the enactment of legislation that applied only to one class of vessels. But we have just passed a resolution calling on the Secretary of Commerce to present to the Congress in December next the results of his investigation of the whole problem together with recommendations for comprehensive legislation. I would feel that the passage of the bill without this further action of the Senate would have been a very unwise thing.

We enact some law that appears to be a good thing. It was introduced in an apparently satisfactory form, but it is amended here and a little is taken away there, and when it finally passes and is enacted into law it has a stately title, a title which read by the public would seem to indicate that it is something that seeks to preserve human life, and the impression is gained that the matter is settled. But it is not settled. The bill we have had before us to-day in my judgment is not worth 30 cents, but together with what the Senator from Washington has done by the passage of the resolution, in my judgment it becomes probable that in the next session of Congress there will be enacted comprehensive legislation which I know the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] desires to have enacted, and so I am entirely satisfied to leave the matter here. I thank the Senate for its forbearance through this long period of time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I want to say just a word with reference to the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. He has been one of the most earnest Senators in behalf of legislation along this line that we have had. My recollection is that four or five years ago he introduced load line bills very much along the lines of what we have just now enacted which passed the Senate. He has been one of the earnest Senators in behalf of load-line legislation.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the Vice President:

S. 1781. An act to establish load lines for American vessels, and for other purposes;

S. 2366. An act to amend subchapter 1 of chapter 18 of the Code of Laws for the District of Columbia relating to degree-conferring institutions;

S. 3736. An act for the relief of soldiers who were discharged from the Army during the World War because of misrepresentation of age.

EXECUTIVE BUSINESS

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. President, a nomination for United States judge for the northern district of Mississippi has been received, and I ask that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HASTINGS in the chair). Without objection, the nomination will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Other judicial nominations have been received to-day, and I make the request that they all be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, they will be so referred.

FEDERAL BUILDING SITE AT SAVANNAH, GA.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 17026) granting a part of the Federal building site at Savannah, Ga., to the city of Savannah for street purposes. It is purely a local matter, but there must be concurrence in an amendment which the Senate will ask the House to accept in order that the measure may become effective. I ask for the immediate consideration of the measure and that the Senate accept the amendment proposed by the committee.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, on page 1, line 6, before the word "feet," to strike out "Twenty-two" and insert "Not to exceed twenty-two," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized in his discretion to convey by quitclaim deed to the city of Savannah, Ga., for street purposes, the following-described strip of land: Not to exceed 22 feet south of and abutting on State Street from Bull Street to Whitaker Street, in the city of Savannah, Chatham County, Ga., in exchange for 65.5 feet, given by the said city of Savannah to the Government as part of a public-building site, in closing President Street in said city.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

SETTLEMENT OF CLAIMS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES

Mr. McMASTER. There is a bill on the calendar, House bill 9285, to provide for the settlement of claims against the United States on account of property damage, personal injury, or death, which was passed by the House, known as the tort bill, and it involves the settlement of claims against the United States. If it is not passed immediately, owing to a number of amendments, it will fail at the present session. I ask for its immediate consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments.

The amendments were, on page 1, after line 1, to strike out the following:

SECTION 1. (a) Subject to the limitations of this act, the Government of the United States authorizes the payment of claims on account of damages to or loss of privately owned property, if the claim accrued after April 6, 1925, and if the damage or loss was caused by the negligence or wrongful act or omission of any officer or employee of the Government acting within the scope of his office or employment. Contributory negligence shall operate to diminish the damages recoverable in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to the claimant.

(b) Authority is hereby conferred upon the head of each department and establishment acting on behalf of the Government to consider, ascertain, adjust, and determine any claim liability for which is recognized under this section, if the amount of the claim does not exceed $5,000. Such amount as may be found to be due to any claimant shall be certified to the Congress as a just claim, together with a brief statement of the character of each claim, the amount claimed, and the amount allowed, with a summary of the evidence upon which the allowance was made. Appropriations for the payment of such claims are hereby authorized and payment thereof may be made to the extent Congress may approve such claims by the granting of appropriations therefor: Provided, That no claim shall be considered by a department or establishment unless presented to it within one year from the date of the accrual of said claim, except that any such claim accrued after April 6, 1925, but prior to the passage of this act, may be presented within six months after the passage of this act.

SEC. 2. Upon the presentation to the Secretary of the Treasury of any such claim for payment, there shall be set off in accordance with the act of March 3, 1875 (sec. 227, title 31, U. S. C.), any claim, whether liquidated or unliquidated, on the part of the United States against the claimant. Acceptance by any claimant of the amount determined under this title shall be deemed to be in full settlement of every claim on account of such damage or loss against the Government of the United States or such officer or employee. No claim that, prior to the time of the passage of this act, has been rejected or reported on adversely by any court or department or establishment authorized to hear and determine the same, shall be considered under this title.

SEC. 3. Section 250, title 28, United States Code (sec. 145 of the Judicial Code, as amended), is amended by adding after the third subsection thereof a new subsection 4, to read as follows:

"Fourth. All claims liability for which is recognized under Title I of this act, if the amount claimed exceeds $5,000."

SEC. 4. Subsection 20, section 24, Judicial Code, as amended (subsec. 20, sec. 41, title 28, U. S. C.), is amended to read as follows:

"(20) Suits against United States. Twentieth. Concurrent with the Court of Claims, of all claims not exceeding $10,000, founded upon the Constitution of the United States or any law of Congress, or upon any regulation of any executive department, or upon any contract, express or implied, with the Government of the United States, or for damages, liquidated or unliquidated, in cases not sounding in tort, in respect to which claims the party would be entitled to redress against the United States, either in a court of law, equity, or admiralty, if the United States were suable, and of all set-offs, counterclaims, claims for damages, whether liquidated or unliquidated, or other demands whatsoever on the part of the Government of the United States against any claimant against the Government in said court; and of any suit or proceeding commenced after the passage of the revenue act of 1921, for the recovery of any internal revenue tax alleged to have been erroneously or illegally assessed or collected, or of any penalty claimed to have been collected without authority or any sum alleged to have been excessive or in any manner wrongfully collected under the internal revenue laws even if the claim exceeds $10,000, if the collector of internal revenue by whom such tax, penalty, or sum was collected is dead or is not in office as collector of internal revenue at the time such suit or proceeding is commenced. Nothing in this paragraph shall be construed as giving to either the district courts or the Court of Claims jurisdiction to hear and determine claims growing out of the Civil War, and commonly known as 'war claims,' or to hear and determine other claims which had been rejected or reported on adversely prior to the 3d day of March, 1887, by any court, department, or commission authorized to hear and determine the same, or to hear and determine claims for pensions; or as giving to the district courts jurisdiction of cases brought to recover fees, salary, or compensation for official services of officers of the United States or brought for such purpose by persons claiming as such officers or as assignees or legal representatives thereof; but no suit pending on the 27th day of June, 1898, shall abate or be affected by this provision. No suit against the Government of the United States shall be allowed under this paragraph unless the same shall have been brought within six years after the right accrued for which the claim is made. The claims of married women, first accrued during marriage, of persons under the age of 21 years, first accrued during minority, and of idiots, lunatics, insane persons, and persons beyond the seas at the time the claim accrued, entitled to the claim, shall not be barred if the suit be brought within three years after the disability has ceased; but no other disability than those enumerated shall prevent any claim from being barred, nor shall any of the said disabilities operate cumulatively. Concurrent with the Court of Claims, of all claims liability for which is recognized under Title I of the Federal tort claims act, if the amount claimed is in excess of $5,000 but does not exceed $10,000. All suits brought and tried under the provisions of this paragraph shall be tried by the court without a jury."

SEC. 5. Suit under section 24 or 145 of the Judicial Code (U. S. C., title 28, secs. 41 and 250), as amended by this act, upon a claim accruing on or after April 6, 1925, and prior to the passage of this act, shall be brought within six months after the passage of this act or within three years after the accrual of the claim.

On page 6, after line 8, to insert:

SECTION 1. (a) Subject to the limitations of this act, the United States hereby grants authority as hereinafter provided for the adjudication and payment of claims on account of damage to or loss of privately owned property not exceeding $50,000 in amount, if the claim accrued after April 6, 1925, and if the damage or loss proximately resulted from the negligence or wrongful act or omission of any officer or employee of the Government within the scope of his office or employment and not out of contract.

(b) The heads of the respective departments and establishments shall promptly cause an investigation to be made under such regulations as the Comptroller General shall prescribe of any happening or event in which the United States, through its officers or employees, becomes involved, irrespective of whether or not there appears liability on the part of the United States, and shall transmit for settlement any claim for damages under this title to the General Accounting Office, together with the record and their report and recommendations as to the amount to be allowed, if any.

(c) The General Accounting Office shall settle and adjust the claims as reported, and shall deduct from the amount found due the owner the amount of any lawful claim of the United States, whether liquidated or unliquidated, against such owner. The net amount due a claimant owner shall be certified to the Congress for its consideration and action, and such certificate shall contain a brief statement of the facts and reasons for allowance of the claim and for deductions, if any. Any amount found due by the Congress and paid under this title shall forever discharge the United States from any claim or demand on account of the damage or loss involved in the particular claim. The right of Congress is expressly reserved to return to the Comptroller General, as provided in section 312 (a) of the Budget and Accounting Act of June 10, 1921 (42 Stat. 25, 26), any claim settled by him for further examination and report or to refer any such claim to the Court of Claims, as provided in section 151 of the act of March 3, 1911 (36 Stat. 1138), for the investigation and determination of facts with its conclusion thereon.

(d) No claim shall be considered under this title unless presented to the department within one year from the date of the accrual of said claim, except that any unpaid claim in excess of $1,000 and not exceeding $50,000 accruing after April 5, 1920, but prior to the passage of this act, may be adjusted and settled if presented within six months after the passage of this act, provided said claim has not heretofore been settled or adjusted or disallowed.

SEC. 2. The United States Court of Claims shall have jurisdiction in event application is duly made by claimant within 90 days from the date of the settlement to review as on certiorari any settlement made by the General Accounting Office under the provisions of this title: Provided, That application for certiorari be by petition disclosing the matters relied upon, supported by a brief, served on the Comptroller General of the United States, who may in person or by such person as he may designate, appear or otherwise advise the court on the action taken by the General Accounting Office. In event the petition for certiorari is denied, or where granted the settlement is sustained, the costs shall be borne by the claimant and the court shall require deposit of sufficient sum to insure payment of such costs before consideration of the petition.

SEC. 7. No suit upon any claim shall be brought under section 4 or 5 if the claim has been determined by the head of any department or establishment under section 1; and no claim shall be presented for consideration to the head of any department or establishment under section 1 if final judgment thereon has been rendered in a suit upon such claim brought under section 4 or 5.

On page 9, line 8, to change the section number from 8 to 4; on page 11, line 12, before the word "caused," to insert "proximately"; in line 15, before the word "attributable," to insert "proximately"; at the top of page 12, to strike out lines 1 to 3, inclusive, as follows: "Contributory negligence shall operate to diminish the damages recoverable in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to the person injured or to the deceased."; on the same page, line 13, before the word "is," to strike out "Exclusive authority" and insert "Authority"; in line 15, after the word "consider," to strike out the comma and "ascertain, adjust, and determine"; in line 17, after the figures "$7,500," to insert a comma and "and said commission shall transmit the claim with the report and recommendation to the General Accounting Office for audit and settlement"; on page 13, line 2, after the word "considered," to strike out "by the commission"; in the same line, after the word "filed," to insert "with the commission"; in line 5, before the word "may," to strike out "commission" and insert "Comptroller General"; in line 14, before the word "shall," to strike out "commission" and insert "Comptroller General"; in line 17, after the word "commission," to insert "and the General Accounting Office"; in line 18, before the word "shall," to strike out "commission and the head of each department or establishment" and insert "President"; in the same line, before the word "provide," to strike out "jointly"; on page 15, after the word "grandparent," to insert "or brother or sister"; on page 17, line 3, before the word "deems," to strike out "commission" and insert "Comptroller General"; on page 18, line 7, after the word "the," to strike out "commission" and insert "Comptroller General"; in line 12, after the words "or the," to strike out "commission" and insert "Comptroller General"; in line 17, after the words "by the," to strike out "commission" and insert "Comptroller General"; in line 20, after the words "by the," to strike out "commission" and insert "Comptroller General"; in line 21, after the words "if the," to strike out "commission" and insert "Comptroller General."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. I offer an amendment to the bill.

The amendment was read, as follows:

On page 11, line 18, after the name "Government," insert the following proviso:

Provided, That any suits now pending against the United States growing out of tort which may have been instituted since April 6, 1925, and which have been brought under any act of Congress heretofore passed may be heard and determined in any Federal court in which the same may now be pending, or compromised by the Attorney General of the United States, but the limit of liability to be recovered therein shall not exceed, either for property damage or for personal injury or death, the sum of $7,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, reads as follows:

TITLE I. PROPERTY-DAMAGE CLAIMS

Be it enacted, etc.—

SECTION 1. (a) Subject to the limitations of this act, the United States hereby grants authority as hereinafter provided for the adjudication and payment of claims on account of damage to or loss of privately owned property not exceeding $50,000 in amount, if the claim accrued after April 6, 1925, and if the damage or loss proximately resulted from the negligence or wrongful act or omission of any officer or employee of the Government within the scope of his office or employment and not out of contract.

(b) The heads of the respective departments and establishments shall promptly cause an investigation to be made under such regulations as the Comptroller General shall prescribe of any happening or event in which the United States, through its officers or employees, becomes involved, irrespective of whether or not there appears liability on the part of the United States, and shall transmit for settlement any claim for damages under this title to the General Accounting Office, together with the record and their report and recommendations as to the amount to be allowed, if any.

(c) The General Accounting Office shall settle and adjust the claims as reported, and shall deduct from the amount found due the owner the amount of any lawful claim of the United States, whether liquidated or unliquidated, against such owner. The net amount due a claimant owner shall be certified to the Congress for its consideration and action, and such certificate shall contain a brief statement of the facts and reasons for allowance of the claim and for deductions, if any. Any amount found due by the Congress and paid under this title shall forever discharge the United States from any claim or demand on account of the damage or loss involved in the particular claim. The right of Congress is expressly reserved to return to the Comptroller General, as provided in section 312(a) of the Budget and Accounting Act of June 10, 1921 (42 Stat. 25, 26), any claim is settled by him for further examination and report or to refer any such claim to the Court of Claims, as provided in section 151 of the act of March 3, 1911 (36 Stat. 1138), for the investigation and determination of facts with its conclusion thereon.

(d) No claim shall be considered under this title unless presented to the department within one year from the date of the accrual of said claim, except that any unpaid claim in excess of $1,000 and not exceeding $50,000 accruing after April 5, 1920, but prior to the passage of this act, may be adjusted and settled if presented within six months after the passage of this act, provided said claim has not heretofore been settled or adjusted or disallowed.

SEC. 2. The United States Court of Claims shall have jurisdiction in event application is duly made by claimant within 90 days from the date of the settlement to review as on certiorari any settlement made by the General Accounting Office under the provisions of this title: Provided, That application for certiorari be by petition disclosing the matters relied upon, supported by a brief, served on the Comptroller General of the United States, who may in person or by such person as he may designate, appear or otherwise advise the court on the action taken by the General Accounting Office. In event the petition for certiorari is denied, or where granted the settlement is sustained, the costs shall be borne by the claimant and the court shall require deposit of sufficient sum to insure payment of such costs before consideration of the petition.

SEC. 3. Nothing in this title shall be construed to affect any right of the United States to reimbursement from an officer or employee of the Government willfully causing the damage or loss giving rise to any claim against the United States under this title.

SEC. 4. (a) The provisions of this title shall not apply to—

(1) Any claim arising out of the loss or miscarriage or negligent transmission of letters or postal matter.

(2) Any claim arising in respect of the assessment or collection of any tax or customs duty.

(3) Any claim for which settlement is provided by the act of October 6, 1917 (secs. 981–982, inclusive, title 34, U. S. C.), relating to the loss, damage, or destruction of the property of officers and enlisted men in the naval service, in the Marine Corps, and in the Coast Guard; by the act of March 3, 1885 (secs. 218–222, inclusive, title 31, U. S. C.), as amended, relating to the loss, damage, or destruction of the property of the officers, enlisted men, and members of the Nurse Corps (female) of the Army; or by the act of March 9, 1920 (secs. 741–752, inclusive, title 46, U. S. C.), or the act of March 3, 1925 (secs. 781–790, inclusive, title 46, U. S. C.), relating to claims or suits in admiralty against the United States.

(4) Any claim arising out of the conveyance, transfer, assignment, or delivery of money or other property or out of the payment to or seizure by the President or Alien Property Custodian of any money or other property, in administering the provisions of the trading with the enemy act, as amended.

(5) Any claim arising out of the administration of the quarantine laws except the laws administered by the Public Health Service of the Treasury Department.

(6) Any claim arising out of the activities or work of the Government, its agents or employees, relating to flood control.

(7) Any claim arising out of the activities of the Government, its agents or employees, relating to river and harbor work.

(b) The act entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of claims arising against the Government of the United States in sums not exceeding $1,000 in any one case," approved December 28, 1922 (U. S. C. title 31, secs. 215–217), is hereby repealed, except that any claim accruing prior to such repeal may be considered, ascertained, adjusted, determined, and certified in the same manner and to the same extent as if this act were not law, and nothing contained in the exceptions in section 4 of this act shall be considered as precluding the Congress from considering claims for injuries or damages arising under said exceptions.

(c) The provisions of any act, in so far as inconsistent with the provisions of this title, are hereby repealed to the extent of such inconsistency.

TITLE II. PERSONAL INJURY AND DEATH CLAIMS

SEC. 201. (a) Subject to the limitations of this act the Government of the United States authorizes the payment of claims on account of personal injury or death, if the claim accrued after April 6, 1925, and if the injury or death was either (1) proximately caused by the negligence or wrongful act or omission of any officer or employee of the Government acting within the scope of his office or employment, or (2) proximately attributable to any defect or insufficiency in any machinery, vehicle, appliance, or other materials and such defect or insufficiency was due to the negligence or wrongful omission of an officer or employee of the Government: Provided, That any suits now pending against the United States growing out of tort which may have been instituted since April 6, 1925, and which have been brought under any act of Congress heretofore passed may be heard and determined in any Federal court in which the same may now be pending, or compromised by the Attorney General of the United States, but the limit of liability to be recovered therein shall not exceed, either for property damage or for personal injury or death, the sum of $7,500.

(b) No compensation shall be allowed for any such injury or death if the injury or death results from the fact that the person injured or the decedent was intoxicated or under the influence of drugs, or if the injury or death is caused by the willful misconduct of the person injured or the deceased, or by the intention of the person injured or the deceased to bring about injury or death to himself or another.

(c) No compensation shall be allowed for any such injury or death to the extent that the injury is continued or aggravated, or that the death is caused by an unreasonable refusal or negligent failure to submit to or procure medical or surgical treatment, the risk of which is, in the judgment of the United States Employees' Compensation Commission (hereinafter referred to as the commission), based upon expert medical or surgical advice, inconsiderable in view of the seriousness of the injury.

SEC. 202. (a) Authority is hereby conferred upon the commission, acting on behalf of the Government, to consider any claim liability for which is recognized under section 201, if the amount of the claim does not exceed $7,500, and said commission shall transmit the claim with the report and recommendation to the General Accounting Office for audit and settlement. Such amount as may be found to be due to any claimant shall be certified to the Congress as a just claim for payment out of appropriations that may be made by Congress therefor, together with a brief statement of the character of each claim, the amount claimed, and the amount allowed with a summary of the evidence upon which the allowance was made: Provided, That no claim shall be considered unless filed with the commission within six months after the injury or one year after death caused by the injury, except that for reasonable cause shown the Comptroller General may allow claims for compensation for such injury to be filed any time within one year after the injury, and except that any claim accrued after April 6, 1925, but prior to the passage of this act, may be filed within one year after the passage of this act.

(b) Acceptance by any claimant of the amount determined under this title shall be deemed to be in full settlement of the claim against the Government of the United States and the officer or employee.

(c) The Comptroller General shall by regulation provide for the form and manner in which claims under this title shall be presented before the commission and the General Accounting Office.

SEC. 203. The President shall provide rules, including penalties for the violation thereof, for the reporting to the commission both by officers or employees of such departments or establishments and by their immediate superiors of injuries or death which may become the basis of a claim under this title.

SEC. 204. (a) The compensation for personal injury shall be paid to the injured individual, except that if the individual dies before compensation has been paid, the compensation shall be allowed and paid as in the case of compensation for death.

(b) Compensation for death shall be allowed and paid as follows:

(1) Compensation shall be allowed only for death caused by injury and occurring within three years after the injury; except that no compensation shall be awarded where the death takes place more than one year after the cessation of disability resulting from such injury, or (in the absence of any such disability preceding death) more than one year after the injury.

(2) The compensation shall be allowed and paid to the following beneficiaries:

(A) To the widow or widower, or if there is no widow or widower, then to the children, share and share alike. Compensation to a child shall not be allowed unless the child is unmarried and is either under 18 years of age or, having reached the age of 18, is physically or mentally incapable of self-support. Compensation for a child under 18 years of age shall be paid to the legal guardian.

(B) To any parent or grandparent or brother or sister who was totally or partially dependent for support upon the deceased at the time of his death, having due regard for the extent of the dependency in cases of partial dependency under this paragraph.

(3) The total compensation which may be allowed on account of any one injury, or injury and death caused thereby, shall not exceed $7,500.

(4) The right of a beneficiary to compensation for death shall not survive the death of such beneficiary.

(c) In addition to the money compensation provided under this title—

(1) In the case of personal injury, the injured individual shall be allowed such expenses for any medical, surgical, and hospital services and supplies (including artificial members and other prosthetic appliances) as the commission adjudges necessary and reasonable for care of or relief from the results of an injury, subject to such regulations as the commission may prescribe with respect to the procurement of such services and supplies.

(2) In the case of death, the personal representatives of the decedent shall be allowed such funeral and burial expenses of the decedent as the commission adjudges to be necessary and reasonable in an amount not to exceed $200.

SEC. 205. As used in this title—

(a) The term "child" means (1) a legitimate child, (2) a child legally adopted prior to the death of the deceased, (3) a stepchild, if a member of the deceased's household at the time of his death, (4) a posthumous child, and (5) an illegitimate child, but as to the father only, if acknowledged in writing by him, or if he has been judicially ordered or decreed to contribute to such child's support or has been judicially decreed to be the putative father of such child: Provided, That an illegitimate child, whose father has not been determined by a competent court, shall have the same rights as a legitimate child under this act.

(b) The term "widow" means the deceased's wife living with or dependent for support upon him at the time of his death, or living apart from him at such time because of his desertion.

(c) The term "widower" means the deceased's husband living with her at the time of her death.

(d) The term "parent" means a father, mother, father or mother through adoption, stepfather, stepmother, and persons who have stood in loco parentis to the deceased for a period of not less than two years just prior to his death.

(e) The term "grandparent" means a grandfather or grandmother.

SEC. 206. The allowance of compensation for personal injury to any claimant under this title may be denied, to such extent as the Comptroller General deems necessary, unless such claimant has, as frequently and at such times and places as may be reasonably required by the commission, submitted himself to examination by a medical officer of the United States or by a duly qualified physician, designated or approved by the commission. The individual injured may have a duly qualified physician designated and paid by him present to participate in such examination. In case of any disagreement between the physician making an examination on the part of the United States and the physician designated by the individual injured, the commission shall appoint a third physician, duly qualified, who shall make an examination. For all examinations after the first required under this title, the claimant shall, in the discretion of the commission, be paid his reasonable traveling and other expenses. Fees for examination made on the part of the United States under this title by physicians who are not already in the services of the United States shall be fixed by the commission. Such fees and traveling and other expenses shall be paid out of the appropriations for the administration of this title.

SEC. 207. (a) Any assignment of a claim of compensation under this title shall be void, and all compensation and claims therefor shall be exempt from all claims of creditors.

(b) If an injury or death for which compensation is payable under this title is caused under circumstances creating a legal liability upon some person other than the United States to pay damages therefor, the Comptroller General may require the beneficiary to assign to the United States any right of action he may have to enforce such liability of such other person or any right which he may have to share in any money or other property received in satisfaction of such liability of such other person, or the Comptroller General may require said beneficiary to prosecute said action in his own name.

(c) If the beneficiary refuses to make such assignment or to prosecute said action in his own name, when required by the Comptroller General, he shall not be entitled to any compensation under this title.

(d) The cause of action when assigned to the United States may be prosecuted by the Comptroller General, and if the Comptroller General realizes upon such cause of action it shall apply the money or other property so received in the following manner: After deducting the amount of the compensation paid to the beneficiary, including any payments made under subdivision (c) of section 204, and the expenses of such realization, which sum shall be paid into the Treasury, the surplus, if any, shall be paid to the beneficiary.

(e) If an injury or death for which compensation is payable under this title is caused under circumstances creating a legal liability in some person other than the United States to pay damages therefor, and a beneficiary entitled to compensation from the United States for such injury or death receives, as a result of a suit brought by him or on his behalf, or as a result of a settlement made by him or on his behalf, any money or other property in satisfaction of the liability of such other person, such beneficiary shall, after deducting the costs of suit and a reasonable attorney's fee, apply the money or other property so received in the following manner:

(1) If the compensation has been paid, he shall refund to the United States so much of the amount of compensation which has been paid by the United States, including any payments made under subdivision (c) of section 204, as is not in excess of the amount of the money and property received. Any amount so refunded shall be paid into the Treasury.

(2) If the compensation has not been paid, he shall credit the money or other property so received upon any compensation payable to him by the United States on account of the same injury or death.

SEC. 208. The provisions of this title shall not apply to—

(a) Any claim for which compensation is provided by the Federal employees' compensation act, as amended (U. S. C. title 5, ch. 15), or by the World War veterans' act of 1924, as amended (U. S. C. title 38, ch. 10, as amended).

(b) Any claim for injury or death incurred in line of duty by any member of the military or naval forces of the United States in cases where relief is provided by other law.

SEC. 209. The act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," approved September 7, 1916, as amended (U. S. C. title 5, ch. 15), is amended by adding at the end thereof a new section to read as follows:

"SEC. 43. That this act may be cited as the Federal employees' compensation act."

TITLE III. MISCELLANEOUS

SEC. 301. When used in this act—

(a) The term "department or establishment" means any executive department or independent establishment not in the legislative or judicial branches of the Government, or any corporation acting as a governmental instrumentality or agency in which the United States owns or controls 51 per cent or more of the voting shares and securities, but shall not include the Panama Railroad;

Any attorney who charges, demands, receives, or collects for services rendered in connection with such claim any amount other than that allowed under this section, if recovery be had, shall upon conviction thereof be subject to a fine of not more than $2,000 or imprisonment for not more than one year, or both.

SEC. 303. Section 173 of the Judicial Code, as amended (U. S. C. title 28, sec. 280), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 173. No claim shall be allowed by the accounting officers or the head of any executive department or other independent establishment or governmental instrumentality, or by any court of the United States, or by the Congress to any person where such claimant or those under whom he claims shall willfully, knowingly, and with intent to defraud the United States have claimed more than was justly due in respect of such claim or presented any false evidence to Congress or to any department, establishment, instrumentality, or court in support thereof."

SEC. 304. The claims of persons under the age of 21 years, first accrued during minority, and of idiots, lunatics, insane persons, and persons beyond the seas at the time the claim accrued, entitled to the claim, shall not be barred if the same be filed with the head of the department, or if suit thereon be brought, within one year after the disability has ceased.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

JUDGE GROVER M. MOSCOWITZ

Mr. NORRIS. I have been directed by the Judiciary Committee to report favorably without amendment the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 431) providing for an investigation of Grover M. Moscowitz, United States district judge for the eastern district of New York, and I ask that it may be considered at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the joint resolution from the House of Representatives.

The joint resolution was read twice by its title.

Mr. NORRIS. I have been directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to ask for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution. The House has sent the joint resolution here. It is the same kind of a resolution which passed the Senate the other day giving authority to a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House to act during the recess of Congress.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, and it was read, as follows:

Whereas certain statements against Grover M. Moscowitz, United States district judge for the eastern district of New York, have been transmitted by the Speaker of the House of Representatives to the Judiciary Committee: Therefore be it Resolved, etc., That EARL C. MICHENER, J. BANKS KURTZ, C. ELLIS MOORE, ROYAL H. WELLER, and HENRY ST. GEORGE TUCKER, being a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives, be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to inquire into the official conduct of Grover M. Moscowitz, United States district judge for the eastern district of New York, and to report to the Committee on the Judiciary of the House whether in their opinion the said Grover M. Moscowitz has been guilty of any acts which in contemplation of the Constitution are high crimes or misdemeanors requiring the interposition of the constitutional powers of the House; and that the said special committee have power to hold meetings in the city of Washington, D. C., and elsewhere, and to send for persons and papers, to administer the customary oaths to witnesses, all process to be signed by the Clerk of the House of Representatives under its seal and be served by the Sergeant at Arms of the House or his special messenger; to sit during the sessions of the House until adjournment sine die of the Seventieth Congress and thereafter until said inquiry is completed, and report to the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of the Seventy-first Congress.

SEC. 2. That said special committee be, and the same is hereby, authorized to employ such stenographic, clerical, and other assistance as they may deem necessary, and all expenses incurred by said special committee, including the expenses of such committee when sitting in or outside the District of Columbia, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives on vouchers ordered by said committee, signed by the chairman of said committee: Provided, however, That the total expenditures authorized by this resolution shall not exceed the sum of $5,000.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE NEAR HICKMAN, KY.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 17007) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Hickman, Ky.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Hickman, Ky., authorized to be built by A. Robbins, of Hickman, Ky., his heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, by the act of Congress approved March 16, 1928, are hereby extended one and three years, respectively, from March 16, 1929.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPATRIATION OF CERTAIN INSANE AMERICAN CITIZENS

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary may be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 16436) to provide for the repatriation of certain insane American citizens, in order that the bill may be put upon its passage. The only reason why I make the request is because of the urgency of the measure. The State Department has asked us to pass the bill, which has passed the House, relating to the insane who are now in Canada. It is absolutely essential that we take charge of those insane and that this act be passed. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the committee will be discharged from the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. There has already been a similar bill here?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes; introduced in the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That upon the application of the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to transfer to St. Elizabeths Hospital, in the District of Columbia, for treatment, all American citizens legally adjudged insane in the Dominion of Canada whose legal residence in one of the States, Territories, or the District of Columbia, it has been impossible to establish. Upon the ascertainment of the legal residence of persons so transferred to the hospital, the superintendent of the hospital shall thereupon transfer such persons to their respective places of residence, and the expenses attendant thereon shall be paid from the appropriation for the support of the hospital.

Upon the request of any such patient, his relatives, or friends, he shall have a hearing in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia upon his mental condition and the right of the superintendent of St. Elizabeths Hospital to hold him for treatment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MAUMEE RIVER BRIDGE

Mr. BAYARD. Yesterday during the calendar call, when House bill 15715 was reached I objected to its consideration. I would now like to withdraw my objection and ask unanimous consent that the bill be taken up and put on its passage.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 15715) authorizing Eugene Rheinfrank, his heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Maumee River at or near its mouth.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BROKERS' CALL LOANS ON STOCK EXCHANGE

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I request that there be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a letter written to me by Robert L. Owen, former Senator from the State of Oklahoma, commenting upon public press announcements of the Federal Reserve Board condemning the New York Stock Exchange brokers' call loans as excessive and as obstructing the power of the reserve banks to furnish adequate credit to commerce.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 22, 1929.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Very great publicity has been given the several public press announcements of the Federal Reserve Board, condemning the New York Stock Exchange brokers' call loans as excessive, as impairing commercial credit rates, as obstructing the power of the reserve banks to furnish adequate credit to commerce. In the published statement of February 7 the board fourteen times stigmatizes these loans as "speculative loans," as if they were reprehensible morally.

Such disturbing public declarations impair the public confidence on which our national credit structure depends and does a public injury. Such opinions, even if sound, should not be exploited in the public press for that very reason. They have a powerful tendency to chill national activities. They are a serious blow at the credits of the stock exchange. But these opinions are both unnecessary and unsound.

These call loans certainly are unusually large, but a reasonable and natural result of our stock-market activity in merchandising the securities of our vast national industries and a result of an enormous concentration of wealth. The loans are five and one-half billions, but the listed securities of the New York Stock Exchange are over seventy billions, and many billions in stocks and bonds are passing back and forth through this market.

Many great new issues are being marketed for our expanding enterprises. A huge exchange market is being maintained, where owners may sell their stocks at will and buy others. A high and rising market attracts both sellers and buyers. The average sales have been running over 3,000,000 shares of stock a day, not to mention bonds, nor curb sales of nearly 2,000,000 shares a day.

These so-called brokers are really bankers and merchants of securities and are carrying in their vaults and in banks on their own account and on account of their customers, stocks worth many billions. The exchange members are men of the highest integrity and of great financial responsibility. They borrow money on call because this vital business of the country requires these loans for its increased efficiency.

Who has the right to say these loans are excessive when required to meet the needs of this market, and when borrowers and lenders are both satisfied, or when business lends $2,600,000,000 to business for the service of business on call loans? The fact that they are needed and supplied answers this question.

The lenders are not depriving commerce of accommodation because as a matter of fact commerce is getting all the accommodation it needs, although overcharged sometimes. The banks give priority of loans to commerce and these call loans are in effect cash reserves payable on demand and available for commerce when required.

Moreover, the New York banks were lending (February 13, 1929) $55,000,000 less than a year ago, and the New York banks and the "outside banks" combined were lending only a little over a quarter of a billion more than a year ago when the Federal Reserve Board assured the United States Senate there was no occasion to be concerned over the then existing conditions. This quarter of a billion has now been withdrawn, probably in deference to the circular of the reserve board to the banks on February 2, 1929.

A year ago (February 14, 1928) the total brokers' loans were $3,819,000,000, consisting of New York banks, $1,152,000,000; "outside banks," $1,531,000,000; "others," $1,136,000,000, and the banks combined are now lending about the same amount.

The present increase is due to "others," I. e., corporations and individuals over whom the board has no color of jurisdiction.

It is an abuse of power for the board to tell a bank it shall not make a New York call loan under penalty of a denial of its legal privilege of reserve-bank accommodation on qualified commercial paper.

The reserve board has no legal right to tell "others" with idle money that their loans on call are excessive or against public policy as "speculative loans." The loans themselves are certainly not "speculative." They are secured by solvent makers of great responsibility, by collateral securities of the highest character worth on an instant established market from 130 to 150 per cent of the loan, and are payable within 24 hours on demand. They are the safest and most liquid of all loans. They are not "speculative" in any true sense. They are cash reserves on call.

But they are stigmatized by the reserve board by a careless figure of speech which many people will fail to correctly interpret. The board probably meant that the proceeds of such loans were used by brokers to accommodate those who speculate, and that it does not approve such loans to "speculators."

Such suggestions from a highly responsible body are injudicious, harmful, and no part of the board's official duty under the Federal reserve act.

Tens of thousands of the transactions on the Stock Exchange have no element of speculation. They are simply sales to millions of purchasers for investment or sales for investors who need their money or sales of stocks and bonds for industrial companies needing money for carrying on the Nation's business.

Thousands of people buy stocks for investment and sell stock for reinvestment, without loans or margins. They sell such investments when they can make a profit, or need cash. Others buy on margins until they can raise the money to pay in full for an intended investment.

Others buy on a margin because they think the stock cheap; that it will increase in value. They can buy more stock on margin and thus hope to make a larger profit when they sell.

Without these buyers and sellers there would be no stock market. Those needing credit on the wide margins required are entitled to the credit they receive, and it seems strangely inconsiderate to disparage loans to these merchants of our securities by the fourteen times repeated charge that these loans are "speculative." The buying and selling of stocks may be or may not be "speculative," and even when it is, it is not against any law or any declared public policy. All buying and selling is speculative. All merchants who buy commodities or real estate for sale are speculating on a gain when they sell and may suffer loss, but they serve the public well and deserve both credit and respect.

Moreover, credit is now abundant to easily accommodate both commerce and the securities market. The resources of the American banks reporting June 30, 1928, were over $71,000,000,000. They are now probably over $73,000,000,000. They have increased forty-five billions in 14 years, sixteen and one-half billions in 5 years past, and three and one-half billions in the last fiscal year. The productive power of the people annually is greater than the total resources of the banks. These results flow from abundant credit, not from a denial of credit.

It is not true that brokers' loans are depriving commerce of needed credit. The banks give commercial loans the preference. Moreover, commerce needs time loans and not call loans. But these call loans, subject to payment in 24 hours, are always instantly available for the needs of commerce.

It is the fact that commerce has not needed these funds that causes them to be unemployed and therefore loanable on call.

But far more significant is the fact that the reserve banks have at this moment many unemployed billions of potential credits available for commodity commercial bills if the need arose.

The reserve banks have about $3,000,000,000 of gold. They could increase these gold holdings more than $500,000,000 easily by simply exchanging reserve notes for gold certificates in transit over the counter. Every gold dollar would support two and one-half times as many reserve notes issued against qualified commodity bills. This money would support a credit structure many times as great as such a volume of cash. The potential powers of the reserve banks to serve commerce are gigantic and are relatively untouched. It is not true that the loans made by the banks or by "others" are preventing the reserve bank of New York or any other reserve bank from supplying needed commercial loans.

It is true that commercial loans are being charged a rate so high as to hinder business, but the reserve banks are seriously to blame for not correcting that by using their present powers to fix a lower rate. Instead of doing so, the New York Reserve Bank stopped buying open-market bills and contracted outside loanable credit by selling its Government bonds. Commerce needs a lower rate, and the United States Government, in its very large refinancing for 1929, deserves a lower rate than it can receive if artificial contraction of credit is demanded by the Reserve Board. The bears should be greatly pleased with the Federal Reserve Bank of New York and probably are whispering sad and melancholy bear advice to timid reserve officials.

It is unsound and unfair to charge the member banks with obstructing the powers of the reserve banks to extend commercial credits. They are doing nothing of the kind, and the board is extremely ill-advised to make such a suggestion. The board would do better if it advised the reserve banks to be more considerate of the member banks.

THE NEW YORK STOCK EXCHANGE

is entitled to the respect and confidence of the American people. It is the greatest market for investment securities in the world. Over 2,500 separate issues of stocks and bonds are listed there, of a value of over $70,000,000,000. Every stock listed must fully expose all of the company's affairs in a manner that investors may be fully informed. Here is every practicable safeguard to insure fair dealing between those who sell and those who buy the securities. Here is the place where every great industry, by the sale of its stocks and bonds, finds the means with which to build and carry on all our great enterprises.

It was largely through its members, their affiliations, and connections that we financed the World War and marketed Government securities. It has been and is a vital center and agency of our national prosperity. Its very intricate and delicate machinery is the last word in efficiency and precision. Its standards of integrity and business ethics are of the highest. Daily contracts made only by word of mouth, but involving hundreds of millions, are all faithfully kept. It has been common to see three and four million shares a day bought and sold without error.

Without the stock and commodity exchanges American prosperity would dry up. It is deplorable for a great governmental agency to reflect on the operations of the New York Stock Exchange, or to deprive its members of needed credits. As every informed person knows, the several published declarations of the board in this matter was followed by an immediate bear reaction on the exchange, with wholesale falling in the prices of stocks. It could not possibly have been the intention of the Federal Reserve Board to create breaks in the stock market, or to injure the bulls and help the bears, yet that was the effect of its publications.

From 1900 to 1921 there were six major bull movements, averaging 25 months each, and six major bear movements, averaging 17 months each, and they have been recurring since and will continue to recur. To break up a bull market is no more the province of the board than to build up a bull market.

The reserve board is not authorized to bring on a bear market but if this policy of contracting credit is pursued it will surely accentuate and intensify the normal reaction from an active high market that always follows in due time from natural causes.

The one weak spot in the Federal reserve act is that those who sell credit (the bankers), were given a preponderance of power on the reserve bank boards over the business men who buy and employ credit (manufacturers, merchants, carriers, etc). The bankers by nature tend to sell credit high and to contract it too much out of both fear and interest. The board has not had the wit to correct this, but was unduly influenced by the banks to favor contraction in 1919–1922 when widespread ruin ensued and over 3,000 banks failed. This unintelligent and timid policy should never be repeated.

The Federal Reserve Board and the Federal reserve banks should at least keep within the duties prescribed by the reserve act and not interfere with the New York stock market by directly or indirectly contracting the credit it requires.

It was my duty as chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee of the United States Senate four times between January and June, 1920, on the floor of the Senate, to solemnly warn the country of the danger of willful, arbitrary contraction of credit and currency. The chairman's voice was not sufficiently considered and an unnecessary financial cataclysm followed. It was caused by unsound and selfish advice to the reserve board and reserve banks.

There were some great bankers who resented the excessively high commodity prices and the implied diminished purchasing power of the dollar and of gold and unduly attributed this undesirable condition to inflation of credit and currency and demanded "deflation," which policy was adopted and carried to extreme limits.

The results were disastrous. This violent change of sudden contraction gave the people no time to readjust their affairs. All debtors and debts arising from war conditions and its immediate consequences were suddenly forced to liquidation and payment when credit was artificially denied.

By giving time and extending credit freely against available security this national disaster could have been prevented and the readjustments from war prices to peace prices made with comparatively small losses. It cost the country many billions through business dislocations and bankruptcies directly due to and caused by the incredible folly of artificially denying credit to the people at such a transition stage of falling prices.

Within two years 6,000,000,000 of bank credits were withdrawn and 1,500,000,000 of currency retired, causing wholesale bankruptcy and unemployment.

After this recent national catastrophe of 1921 from arbitrary willful credit contraction the Congress and the business men of America should never again permit a repetition of such financial mismanagement.

The learned Prof. Charles A. Dice, Ph. D., etc., of Ohio University, of College of Commerce in his excellent work, The Stock Market (580) wisely says:

"The investor in stocks is one of the greatest constructive factors in the economic organization. He puts his funds into the different lines of industry when they are in a period of depression, etc.

"We need but few men who devote their whole time to the stock market but we need many men who are engaged in business and invest their funds on the long-time basis in the stock market."

The bears constantly warn the public against buying stock because too high. The New York Stock Exchange requires full information. The scales are delicately adjusted. Government officials should not interfere except as expressly authorized by law.

Yours very respectfully,

ROBERT OWEN.

FLYING OF CHURCH PENNANT

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article from the New Haven Journal-Courier relative to the use of the church flag.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BISHOP PERRY DEFENDS USE OF CHURCH FLAG—PROTESTS PROPOSAL TO PROHIBIT BANNER FLYING ABOVE "OLD GLORY"

Objection to the proposal recently made in the United States Senate which would prohibit the flying of the church flag above the American flag on naval vessels during church services, was voiced Sunday by Right Rev. James DeWolf Perry, D. D., Episcopal Bishop of Rhode Island, at the annual sermon to the Society of Mayflower Descendants, delivered in St. John's Pro-Cathedral at Providence.

"The hand of every American should be raised in protest against such an act of surrender," Bishop Perry declared.

"The first act performed by white men setting foot upon the shores of our western world was to raise the standard of the cross and kneel in prayer to God," the bishop said, "The first ship to land a company of Englishmen on the coast of Virginia carried at the masthead the emblem of the cross. The American Navy has for generations at the time of divine service each week raised the same cross of Christ on the church flag above the Stars and Stripes.

"In a resolution introduced by a Member of Congress last week it was proposed that this time-honored custom should be discontinued and that the flag emblazoned with the cross should be permanently removed from its place. The hand of every American should be raised in protest against such an act of surrender. The sign of the cross has symbolized throughout the ages since it first stood on Calvary, the offer of the believing heart to pay the price of faith."

HEFLIN PROPOSAL VOTED DOWN

Bishop Perry referred to a proposal offered in the Senate on February 5 by Senator HEFLIN, Alabama Democrat, which would prohibit the flying of a church pennant during the services at sea above the American flag on United States warships. The proposal was offered as an amendment to the cruiser bill and resulted in a heated discussion in the Senate. The Senate then went on record by a roll-call vote as to its views on the question and the proposal was voted down by a vote of 68 to 10.

Faith in God, Bishop Perry declared, and concern regarding spiritual welfare, played an important part in shaping the history of the Nation, and will play a similar part in the future.

"It would be impossible," he said, "to understand the background of our national life without an appreciation of its religious origin. By the same token there can be no confident approach to the future that disregards the Nation's spiritual outlook. The ultimate issue in the life of every people concerns its faith. If that be kept wholesome and vital and true, a country's destiny is sure.

"Other means of defense, whether they be intellectual, financial, or military, may avail for a while, but in the end you will find from universal experience since the world began that a race or nation will endure just as long as it preserves the qualities of trust and loyalty, obedience, and reverent devotion. When these are removed, even though the hollow form of organized religion stand, the foundations first of the home will crumble, threatening then the social order, and at last plunging the whole body politic into ruin.

"Consequently any effort to do honor to the founders of our Republic and to perpetuate their work must begin with resolute adherence to the faith which inspired them. To maintain undeviating belief in God and to award Him the supreme place in thought and worship and conduct is a policy of pure patriotism quite as much as consistent religion.

"An organization which takes for its charter the defense and promotion of American traditions can set before itself no more important objective than the witness which it may bear to the gospel of Jesus Christ."

TOLL BRIDGES

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, on yesterday's Senate Calendar I counted 58 bridge bills, and then I am told that I missed some and did not count all of them. Most of those bills were passed at the session of the Senate on yesterday afternoon. Most of those bridges will be toll bridges, obstructing the freedom of the American highway system.

The question of toll bridges has reached such a stage that I think it deserves the special attention of the Congress of the United States. I think it is even an alarming situation which is developing so rapidly in our country. For this reason I want to take a little of the time of the Senate to discuss the proposition and to present a few facts in reference to the toll-bridge system throughout the entire country.

The Constitution of the United States gives to Congress exclusive power for the regulation of interstate and foreign commerce. It likewise gives to Congress the right of the establishment and control of post roads. At the present time more than 85 per cent of the railroad traffic of the United States is interstate commerce, which indicates that a like proportion of the business of the United States is also interstate.

When we contemplate these facts and view the enormous volume and size of interstate business, it is a sad commentary to see that the Government is only spending $75,000,000 a year in Federal aid to roads. A single State will put on a program for $100,000,000 in two or three years and draw only $2,000,000 a year from the Federal Government. The roads built by this cost outlay will carry heavy interstate traffic and will all be used as post roads.

The time has therefore arrived—in fact, has long since passed—when the States should demand that the Federal Government bear its just proportion of road building so urgently demanded in all parts of the country.

TOLL BRIDGES A MENACE

The most important part of any road system is its bridges. The prairie schooner crossed the broad prairies with comparative celerity, but found great difficulty when it approached the streams. The development of our country and the advancement of its civilization went with the building of bridges. Bridges can not be considered otherwise than as the most elemental part of the highway system.

In the United States we are committed beyond recall and even beyond argument to the free-highway system. The toll bridge is an offensive violation of this principle and has no standing as an integral part of the American road system. It is not only a gross obstruction of traffic, but is even more a gross insult to the American spirit of freedom. We are committed to the policy of free public roads as strongly and irrevocably as to the policy of free public schools.

This policy has been intensified manyfold by the development of the automobile and of the truck. When we know that last year's consumption of gasoline was 10,596,000,000 gallons and that these vehicles traveled more than 137,000,000,000 miles upon our roads, there is no argument left for the continuance of the toll bridge. While it is true that most of the bridges in our country are free, still private interests seeking excessive profits have succeeded in getting charters for many interstate bridges and many others over navigable streams at important points.

PRIVATE INTERESTS SEEK RIGHTS

On October 1, 1927, there were 233 toll bridges in operation on the highways of the United States. Of this number 42, or 18 per cent, were owned by the public and 191, or 82 per cent, were owned by private interests. On the same date, 29 more were in process of construction. Of these, 9, or 31 per cent, were owned by the public and 20, or 69 per cent, were owned by private interests.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I have at this session introduced a resolution providing for the appointment of a committee from both Houses of Congress to investigate the toll-bridge question. I agree with the Senator from Iowa that the principle of toll roads which was in vogue in this country for so many years has been brought back by the inauguration of toll bridges by the hundreds. I have tried numbers of times during this session to secure action on my resolution, but, unfortunately, I have not been able to get it out of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. If the committee proposed by my resolution could be appointed it would do a great good in making a thorough investigation of the question of toll-bridge legislation and in furnishing the information secured to Congress and to the American people as it should be brought before them.

Every road organization in the United States that I know anything about is anxious that that resolution be favorably acted upon. The Bureau of Public Roads, which is the guardian of our road systems to a large extent, is anxious that it be acted on, but I have not been able to get results. I want it known publicly why we have not been abe to get the resolution through at this session of Congress.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I shall be glad to help the Senator from Nevada get his resolution out of the committee, or even to discharge the committee, if the fault is in the committee, because I agree to the proposition embodied in the resolution.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. BRATTON. I wonder if the Senator from Iowa would be willing to have a vote on the conference report taken, and make disposition of the matter, and let the record of it follow the address of the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BROOKHART. If the Senator refers to the conference report now under consideration, I had a different arrangement with some other Senators who are interested in the report.

Mr. BRATTON. I withdraw the request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa will proceed.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, the Sixty-ninth Congress authorized 55 more toll bridges on which construction had not been commenced. Of these, 12, or 22 per cent, were granted to public agencies, and 43, or 88 per cent, were granted to private interests.

Up to April 30, 1928, there had been introduced in the Seventieth Congress bills providing for the authorization of 122 new toll bridges not previously authorized.

I have already mentioned 58 such bills I counted on yesterday's Senate Calendar. Of these, 39, or 32 per cent, were for public operation and 83, or 68 per cent, were for private operation. Of the 122 bridges covered by these bills in the Seventieth Congress, 67 have been definitely authorized by the passage of the bills and the signature of the President. Sixteen of these, or 24 per cent, will be operated by public agencies, and 51, or 76 per cent, by private interests; and during the course of yesterday's proceedings the Senate passed several more such bills.

In addition to the bridges covered by bills introduced and passed by the Sixty-ninth Congress, or introduced in the Seventieth Congress up to April 30, 1928, there are 78 other bridges which, according to the information obtained by the bureau, were under consideration or proposed on October 31, 1927. Of these 28, or 36 per cent, were proposed as public bridges and 50, or 64 per cent, were to be operated by private parties. It will be noted also that most of these public bridges are toll bridges, although operated by a county, city, or a State. However, in most instances their cost will be amortized, and at the end of 20 years under the law they will become free bridges. That is not so offensive as a perpetual toll bridge, of course. Of the 424 toll bridges in operation, under construction, or proposed for which information was available on October 31, 1927, 217 are on the system of Federal-aid highways, the main traffic highways of the United States. All of the private toll bridges are dependent on their income from traffic flowing to them over highways built by public funds.

OBSTRUCT FREE-BRIDGE BUILDING

The above facts have not only been asserted by Thomas H. MacDonald, Chief of the United States Bureau of Public Roads, but he has also found outstanding examples of obstructionist tactics on the part of private toll-bridge interests to prevent the building of free bridges by the public or the securing of legislation to permit States to build bridges with advantageous loans of necessary capital from the best banking houses by issuing revenue bonds; that is, bonds to be retired from the revenue earned by the bridge itself.

I ask the Senate to notice that the bureau discovered tactics which are obstructing the enactment of laws that will permit that sort of operation by the States or the counties or the cities for the purpose of protecting this private toll-bridge system. Such bonds are not a debt in the constitutional sense against the community, and when issued for a necessary and desirable improvement, are sound financing.

Federal aid is available even under the terms of the Oldfield amendment to build bridges, and the capital supplied by the States can be retired through the collection of tolls.

Within the United States and on the international boundary on October 1, 1927, there were 233 operating toll bridges; and on the same date there were 29 other bridges in process of construction. Of the 233 bridges in operation, 42 were owned by the public, of which number 7 were owned and operated by State governments, 20 by county governments, and 15 by cities. The remaining 191 were owned privately—154 by toll-bridge companies and 37 by railroad companies. Twelve of these new private bridges are on the international boundary.

Of the 29 new structures that were under construction, 9 were owned by and will be operated by the public, 2 by States, 4 by counties, and 3 by cities. The other 20 were in process of building by private corporations, of which 18 were toll-bridge companies and 2 were railroad companies.

Following is the number and location of toll bridges in the United States on October 1, 1927. I think this table is important:

In Alabama there were 2 toll bridges in operation, both of which were privately owned.

In Arkansas there were 1 publicly owned, 3 privately owned in operation, and 1 privately owned under construction, making a total of 5 for that State.

In California there were 1 publicly owned bridge in operation, 3 privately owned, and 2 under construction by private interests.

In Florida there were 11 publicly owned in operation, 12 privately owned, and 2 private bridges under construction.

In Georgia there were 1 publicly owned in operation and 3 privately owned.

In Idaho there were 1 privately owned in operation and 1 privately owned under construction.

In Illinois there were 4 publicly owned in operation and 1 privately owned.

In Kentucky there were 9 privately owned in operation.

In Louisiana there were 2 publicly owned in operation, 1 under construction, 1 privately owned in operation, and 3 under construction.

Mr. President, I ask that this table be inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STECK in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. DILL. I was not here when the Senator began his discussion. Do I understand that the Senator is critical of the building of toll bridges throughout the country?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; very much so.

Mr. DILL. Of course I am not as familiar with the needs of the eastern part of the country as I am with those of the far West; but, personally, I have always been very much in favor of allowing the building of toll bridges in the far West, for the reason that without them we must pay a larger toll in the form of ferries, which are unreliable and oftentimes dangerous, and with bridges the toll is much smaller. The time required for crossing is pratically nothing. It takes practically no time to cross them, and within a reasonable time the bridges are paid for and the toll removed, and thus we have the use of the bridges all the time we are paying for their building; whereas if we continued to use the ferries we would have nothing but the ferries, and at the end of the same period of time we would have paid more money, and would have been annoyed by having to use ferries, and would also be endangered continuously when the waters are high.

Mr. BROOKHART. I fully agree with the Senator that, as compared with the ferry system, that would be true; but I pointed out in the beginning that the Government is spending only $75,000,000 a year in Federal aid to roads; that one State, for instance—and I used the figures from my own State—puts on a road program that will amount in two or three years to $140,000,000, and during that time it will get only $2,000,000 a year from the Federal Government, and every one of those roads will carry a heavy interstate commerce, and every one of them will be used as a post road. Therefore, I was advocating an increase of the Federal aid, which could be done under the Oldfield bill now, and the building direct of these free bridges, which would be better than any toll-bridge system or ferry system, either one.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. I think I am as much opposed to having traffic interferred with by paying tolls as any one else who travels the highways; but my thought was that there is very little chance of having these bridges built if they have to be built through public taxation, while, on the other hand, companies would be very agreeable to undertaking the construction and completing it, and then taking the revenue as it would come from the public traffic.

Up to a certain time there were only two bridges over the Ohio from Pittsburgh down to Cincinnati; but since this wonderful new road-building movement that has come about in the last 10 years the traffic in the country has been so great that we not only have more bridges built at more places, but at some places we have two bridges built in the same town across the same river, which would indicate that there must be a profit—that is, the revenue will justify it. At the same time, however, I think if it had to be done by public taxation many a community would be denied the transport, simply because the public could not be induced to do it. I have the feeling that the traffic will be better facilitated by this plan, although I am very much opposed to the retardation of traffic by having to pay toll.

Mr. BROOKHART. There are plenty of facts to sustain a good deal of the Senator's conclusion, but when you get all the facts they make a different picture. I am sure that these profiteers who can see great profits in a toll bridge are very anxious to have the privilege of building those bridges, and I am sure they will also work up a political condition that will fight the building of them by public taxation.

For instance, there is such a situation at Council Bluffs, Iowa, and Omaha, Nebr., right now. There is an old toll bridge there, owned by the street railway company. The county of Pottawattomie, on the Iowa side of the river, voted $400,000 to build a new bridge; but the public-utility company organized a political campaign in Omaha and defeated their bond issue of $800,000, I believe—I am not quite certain as to the figures—to build their part of this bridge, and it was thereby defeated. At the same time, this public-utility company kept its political campaign well covered and hidden in every way, and did it through other arguments and other agencies. It never came out in the open.

That bridge which it owns—a very old bridge, built back before the present general toll bridge law was enacted—is earning over $600,000 a year; but it cost less than $1,200,000. It is earning more than 50 per cent on its cost, and taking that sort of a toll from the public; and at the same time, just exactly as the Senator said, by a shrewd political campaign in Omaha the public has been prevented from building and owning a free bridge. Of course, however, I am the sort of a person who is ready to fight that kind of a situation in our politics and present it to the people and the public in such a way that they can get these bond issues and can do justice to themselves.

Further, I have already shown that the automobiles of the United States traveled 137,000,000,000 miles last year. The statement of that fact is the statement of a demand so big that you can hardly measure it for free roads and free bridges. The American Automobile Association has openly decided now to fight this political combination that prevents the building of free bridges. It has become a powerful thing, and it may be able to counteract the secret political influences of the private owners of these institutions.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, there is now a bridge across the Ohio at East Liverpool, one across the Ohio at Steubenville, and another one building; there is one across at Marietta, another one at Portsmouth, another one at Ironton, one being constructed at Ashland from the Kentucky side, and another one at Huntington from the West Virginia side; and there is authorization for one across the Ohio at Sistersville, another one across the Ohio from Maysville, Ky., and I do not know how many others. I can not believe that private enterprise would be justified in undertaking the construction of these bridges unless there was profit in it. To me that is the greatest possible evidence of the tremendous travel of our people.

Mr. BROOKHART. I will present some figures on the profits of these bridges before I conclude.

Mr. DILL. Along that line, will the Senator yield for just a moment?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. DILL. The Senator's reference to the Ohio River calls to mind the fact that we have a similar situation to deal with in connection with the Columbia River and its tributary, the Snake River, in my own State.

Twenty years ago there was but one bridge across that river for its entire length. To-day there is another free bridge, a part of the highway system, and there are four toll bridges, and another one building; and they are all paying for themselves. They are all at places where, if the bridges did not exist, literally thousands of people would cross on the ferries. They must cross; they will cross; and there are still many ferries running at other places. I am very much concerned that no rule shall be laid down by the committees or by the Congress that will prevent those sections of the country where great rivers exist from building bridges, even though they be toll bridges, if public bridges can not be built, because it is extremely important to those sections that that privilege shall be continued.

Mr. BROOKHART. I have followed that idea in this session of Congress, and had up with the committee the proposition of getting a more favorable form of bill toward amortizing and making these bridges free ultimately. That form has been adopted, and these bills, as I understand, are all framed according to that new and better form; but this private toll bridge at Omaha was built before the general law was enacted and is not subject to the provisions of the general law, and there is no regulation of its tolls by the War Department. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] has on the calendar a bill to amend that law; it provides for amendment by Congress in its own provisions, so that we can get control and stop that extortionate toll if the Howell bill passes; but it is being objected to and its passage is being prevented here right now in the present session.

Mr. DILL. The other point about this toll proposition on bridges is that in every case where we have a bridge the toll for the bridge is less than the ferry toll was, which is another advantage, even though the bridges are making profits. Of course, it may be that owing to the fact that the Columbia River is a turbulent river our ferry charges are higher than they would be in some sections; but the fact remains that where the ferry charges run 75 cents and a dollar and a dollar and a quarter and a dollar and a half at certain times of the year, the automobile toll is 50 cents.

Mr. BROOKHART. I would have no argument with the Senator over that proposition and that comparison.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, it was the argument of the Senator from Washington that up to this time has prevailed with the committee and with Congress; and I still have some fear of changing the policy for the same reason that the Senator has announced. That is the suggestion I made to the Senator a while ago. I do not like the idea of toll bridges; I should like to have them free; but I should hesitate to obstruct private capital in building them until at least we were justified in doing so.

Mr. BROOKHART. There is only one way to obstruct private capital successfully, and that is for the public to adopt a policy of building these bridges, and if the public would build competing bridges it would not be long before they would be rid of the private competition, because a free bridge can take the traffic away from a toll bridge any time. There is no trouble about that at all.

Quite a large number of these bridges which I have described are interstate bridges, and I have already inserted in the RECORD a list of the States, with the number of bridge that are interstate, also showing whether the bridges are publicly owned or privately owned, in operation or under construction.

Mr. President, from the tables accompanying this article it is evident that the toll-bridge question is national in character, not only because of the national use of these bridges in interstate commerce, but also because of their location in nearly all of the States of the Union. Of the 262 bridges in operation or under construction October 1, 1927, 155 are intrastate bridges, in 31 States; 97 span streams which constitute the boundaries of States; and 12 are international bridges, of which 5 are on the Canadian boundary—1 of these in Minnesota and 4 in New York, and 7 are on the Rio Grande in Texas.

There are only nine States which have no toll bridges in operation or building within these States or spanning a boundary stream. They are Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Massachusetts, New Mexico, Nevada, Rhode Island, Utah, and Wyoming. The other 39 States all have one or more such bridges in operation or under construction.

There are 14 toll bridges in operation on the Mississippi River and 4 more under construction. Among the bridges east of the Mississippi River there were 119 toll bridges built or building, and west of the Mississippi there were 125 financed by tolls.

Prior to 1928 there were only two years, 1910 and 1919, when there were as many as six new toll bridges opened to traffic; and the total number constructed from 1900 to 1921 was only 67, or an average of 3 a year for the 22-year period.

In 1922 the number completed suddenly jumped to 12. During the next two years there were only 9 opened, but in 1925 the number completed jumped to 15, in 1926 it was 12, but it jumped to 23 in 1927. As I have shown, there were 29 in process of building in 1927, and the indications are that the record for 1928 will approach this.

From these facts it is evident that the toll-bridge problem is a rapidly growing problem, and certainly demands the keenest attention of Congress at once.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have listened to the Senator with a great deal of interest, and I certainly am in very hearty sympathy with him with reference to roads that are built by a State with Federal aid; but there is a class of roads that are not built by the State and not built with Federal aid. Whether the Senator is right in his strictures or criticisms of toll bridges as applied to these lateral roads or not I am somewhat in doubt.

In North Carolina we have probably done in the last seven or eight years as much road building, in proportion to our population and wealth, as has been done in any State of the Union. I think there is but one toll bridge in the State on what we know as the State system. The State system in North Carolina is a system of roads crossing the State, up and down the State, connecting all the county seats with the system. That constitutes the State system. The balance of the road work of the State is done by the counties.

It frequently happens that there is an outlying territory that is cut off from the State system by a wide body of water. We have in North Carolina a great many broad rivers; we have some very large sounds. The sound system of North Carolina begins probably less than 30 miles from the Virginia line and runs down nearly to the South Carolina line. One of those sounds runs east and west and the others run north and south. They separate sections of the State, so that the people have no communication except by water. They have had to use ferries or boats for the purpose of communicating. They are beginning now to bridge those sounds, some of the bridges being miles in length.

It may be necessary to bridge these rivers or these sounds in order to connect some outlying portion of the State with a road system, and these roads frequently are very short roads, and it would seem necessary to offer some inducement to secure the construction of bridges on those short lateral lines. Do I understand the Senator as condemning a system of toll bridges to those short lateral roads?

Mr. BROOKHART. I stated the figures a little earlier, showing that even those bridges draw their traffic largely from the Federal-aid roads, perhaps some distance from where the bridges begin, and would not that situation exist in the Senator's State?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I do not think so.

Mr. BROOKHART. The travel, in other words, in this particular location would not be confined to that locality, but the interstate traffic would cross those bridges, too.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think, in most instances in my State, these bridges are built very largely to accommodate a local situation.

Mr. BROOKHART. But do not the people in that locality travel out on State-aid roads?

Mr. SIMMONS. The purpose is to provide them access to the highway. If they can not build these little local roads, they can not connect themselves with and get the benefit of the State system.

Mr. BROOKHART. It would occur to me that few toll bridges would pay unless they had a traffic that was gathered, in part, at least, from travel over Federal-aid roads.

Mr. SIMMONS. There might be but little traffic over Federal-aid roads going to and coming from these places outside of the immediate residents of that community or section.

Mr. BROOKHART. Let me ask the Senator again, would not each and all of the toll bridges he has described be traveled over by the people carrying the mail? Would they not be used for the transportation of the mail?

Mr. SIMMONS. I take it they would be used for the transportation of the mail, but the Federal Government would have no part in their construction.

Mr. BROOKHART. But the Federal Government has the benefit of their use, the same as on any other road.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Government would therefore be benefited by the construction of the road, and the construction of the road might be impossible unless it would bridge the water.

Mr. BROOKHART. That would be very true; but I made this proposition—that as to nearly all these roads carrying interstate traffic, and also being used as post roads, it is the duty of the Government to build them or to aid in building them; and this $75,000,000 that we are appropriating now for Federal aid in building roads is only a little fraction of what we really ought to be doing in North Carolina and other States.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator is entirely right about that; the Government is not doing its part in the construction of the interstate highways of this country. I agree with him about that.

Mr. BROOKHART. I pointed out that under the Oldfield amendment this Federal-aid money can be used in the construction of bridges. Therefore, if we had a proper appropriation from Congress, if we had three or four hundred million instead of seventy-five million—and that would be a small proportion, I think—we could build these bridges where they need to be built and where they will connect traffic with the general Federal-aid system.

Mr. SIMMONS. There is no controversy between the Senator and me about that proposition.

Mr. BROOKHART. I think not.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am in accord with the Senator, but I understood he was making a very sweeping and broad condemnation of the toll bridge.

Mr. BROOKHART. I was doing that, because I believe in the freedom of the road, as I announced in the beginning.

Mr. SIMMONS. I believe in the freedom of the road, and I am entirely in sympathy with the Senator if he confines his argument to the State highways or the interstate highways built by the State, or built by the State and the Federal Government in conjunction, but I think a different principle applies to these short lateral roads which are built simply for the purpose of accommodating a community, and in order to enable that community to take advantage of the system constructed by the State.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator might be able to find such a community in North Carolina, but I really believe there is no such community in all of my State.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator has not in his State such a system of waters as we have in North Carolina.

Mr. BROOKHART. We have a river on each side, and a few lakes out in the middle.

Mr. SIMMONS. Instead of one river, we have 20 or 30, 30 at least, I should say, quite considerable streams.

Mr. BROOKHART. We have three or four pretty good rivers.

Mr. SIMMONS. All of those streams that originate in North Carolina except one empty into the sound system rather than into the ocean.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRATTON in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think some of the conditions the Senator from North Carolina has mentioned obtain in Florida. We have such an enormous coast line, both on the Atlantic and on the Gulf, and so many rivers and bays and bayous and bodies of water that, if they were bridged, we would connect up the whole system of highways, whereas without a bridge we would probably go hundreds of miles to get to points we could reach if we could cross by bridge. Many of the counties where that situation obtains are already taxed to the limit in the building of the highways. They have not the funds with which to build these bridges, which are sometimes 4 or 5 miles long—steel bridges, and quite expensive.

In order to induce private capital to go into an enterprise like that we must make it a toll bridge. That is the only way the investor will get back his money. It is of great benefit to certain communities and saves a great deal of trouble and expense to a territory that otherwise would not be reached.

I agree with the Senator from North Carolina that there are instances where we must invite private capital, because the local communities can not bear the burden of constructing the bridges.

Mr. BROOKHART. If proper Federal aid were accorded they might be able to do it and make the bridges free.

Mr. SIMMONS. But the Federal Government does not now assist the State in construction unless it is an interstate road.

Mr. BROOKHART. No; it is limited in that way.

Mr. SIMMONS. The little roads that I am talking about are not interstate in any sense of the word and are not provided for in the present law. If we are to enact national legislation sufficiently broad to cover the cases I have in mind, we would have to extend it to all road construction within a State. That probably would be a little further than the Federal Government would want to go.

Mr. BROOKHART. I think it should go to all of the post roads and all of the interstate-traffic roads, but let me read the figures of the department.

Mr. SIMMONS. There is no road in this country that I know anything about that does not become or is not likely to become a post road.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is what I think. The department said:

> Of the 424 toll bridges in operation, under construction, or proposed, for which the information was available on October 31, 1927, 217 are on the system of Federal-aid highways, the main traffic highways of the United States. All of the private toll bridges are dependent on their income from traffic flowing to them over highways built by public funds.

In other words, the toll bridge, unless it has the benefit of highways either built by public funds of the State or Nation, can not earn profits and can not survive.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is a misleading statement of the department. For instance, there is one county in my State that is practically surrounded by water. There is scarcely any way to get out of that county except by boat, or was not until recently. But for the fact that the State included in its highway system a provision that all county seats should be embraced, that county would have been without a national or State road.

Mr. BROOKHART. It was not able to build a bridge by itself.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; it was not able to build a bridge by itself. That county could not have gotten in touch with the State system except by building a bridge over some of those waters. That may be so not only of a county but of a township or small community. It has to build a bridge in order to come in touch with the main road, and in that sense, of course, it couples itself with the national highway system. But if those people are compelled to build that bridge themselves they will not be able so to couple themselves. Why should we interfere with their securing this communication or connection by getting some one to build a bridge for them provided they are willing to pay the tolls?

Mr. BROOKHART. I say that if the Federal Government should neglect its duty toward that community and the State should neglect its duty toward that community, it should not be prohibited from building such a bridge. What I am insisting on is that the Government shall do its duty in building these bridges and roads. Take the community the Senator has mentioned. The United States mail goes in over that bridge to those people. There is interstate traffic. They perhaps get some things from Iowa sometimes and they send some things which they produce there to Iowa or other Northern States. This interstate traffic is going in and out of that community all the time. Interstate commerce being a Federal proposition, the Government owes it to that community to aid and assist in building its bridge and its roads. The bridge is a vital part of the road system.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then the Senator does not dispute that his proposition would require the Government to construct or assist in the construction of every road built in the country.

Mr. BROOKHART. Where there is interstate traffic or the road is used as a post road; yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the community to which that road is built becomes engaged in interstate commerce? That is the Senator's proposition?

Mr. BROOKHART. That is my proposition.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator believe we could get such a proposition as that through the Congress?

Mr. BROOKHART. I am just starting on that phase of it. I do not know how I may come out.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am with the Senator just as far as he can get the Government to go in aiding us in building our highways. I am willing to go with him as far as he can get the Government to go, but I am afraid he is attempting to go a little further than it would be possible to induce the Government to go.

Mr. BROOKHART. I think that is right, and I think the Senator is justified even though his State pays a much larger proportion into the Federal Treasury than my State. But he will have a chance then to get some back of that tax which his State is justly entitled to have back. But on the other hand the Senator is broad-minded enough that he does not hesitate to use the Federal funds to benefit the road system of the whole country.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is true, because I think it is the duty of the Federal Government. The Federal Government is using our roads to a very large extent. Before the Federal Government began to use our roads to the extent that they do now, the Federal Government realized its interest in those roads. It is written in the Constitution. But now since we have inaugurated the Rural Free Delivery system and the Parcel Post System the Federal Government is using every post road in the country every day in the year, with its automobiles and its trucks, and helping to tear them up and contributing very little toward their construction and their maintenance—none, indeed, to their maintenance and very little to their construction.

Mr. BROOKHART. If the Senator is attracted to this proposition and we can get Congress to consider it favorably, I am sure a large majority of Senators and a large majority of the Members of the House will favor the idea. I think the trouble is that we have been going along easily and we have got a $75,000,000 appropriation which seemed to be enough when we had the old horse and wagon. We are sticking to that old idea now and are not measuring up to the present situation. In my State at this moment we are putting on a $140,000,000 road program. Within three years we will spend something like that sum, and we will get $2,000,000 a year of Federal aid, yet every one of those roads will be used as an interstate road with heavy interstate traffic, and every one will be used as a post road.

I had a little experience here in the Senate upon a similar proposition. I may refer to it again. One day the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] put a statement in the RECORD to the effect that his State paid some $300,000,000 in Federal taxes—these figures may not be exact, because I am speaking from memory—and got back only 1.8 per cent of it in Federal aid to roads. In the same table he showed that the State of Iowa paid only some $10,000,000 in Federal taxes and got back 16 per cent, or $1,600,000, at that time in Federal aid to roads. He cited that as an instance of great injustice to Pennsylvania.

I asked him why it was that Pennsylvania paid $300,000,000 in Government taxes and Iowa paid only $10,000,000. Iowa produces more out of mother earth at least than Pennsylvania, but Pennsylvania gets Iowa's production away in the profits of the Steel Trust and the Aluminum Trust and the other financial combinations, and then objects to paying back a just proportion toward constructing the highways of the United States, although a large part of her earnings which made up the basis of that $300,000,000 Federal tax came from Iowa and North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator think it would be possible to get the Government to consent to contribute to road construction of the several States in proportion to the amount of money they pay into the Public Treasury.

Mr. BROOKHART. Not at all, and it would not be fair.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish the Senator might do that, because—and I do not say it to boast of it, but I say it, because it is a fact—the records show that in the present fiscal year North Carolina will pay into the Federal Treasury the largest amount of Federal taxes of any State in the Union except New York.

Mr. BROOKHART. More than Pennsylvania, even?

Mr. SIMMONS. More than Pennsylvania and more than Illinois. North Carolina is next to New York in this present fiscal year.

Mr. BROOKHART. That reflects the great industrial growth of North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. We have done wonderful road construction in that State. I suppose the State and the counties have spent in the last seven or eight years something like $150,000,000 in road construction, and we are going on with the program. We have not finished it at all.

Mr. BROOKHART. How much Federal aid does the Senator's State receive?

Mr. SIMMONS. We receive very little aid from the Federal Government. It is a mere pittance in proportion to the amount that the State and the counties have paid. I am with the Senator in his desire to see that the Federal Government contributes a larger proportion to the construction of the highways of the country.

Mr. BROOKHART. The bureau cites some interesting examples of these toll bridges. For instance, there is one over the Cannonball River at Cannonball, N. Dak., which was built at a cost of $300. It was merely a 2-wheel ways supported flimsily on piles. The charge for an automobile or a horse-drawn vehicle to pass over it is 50 cents, notwithstanding the lack of a floor between the wheelways which makes it necessary to unhitch the horses and wade them over while the wagon is pulled across. This is, of course, an extreme case, but there are many other abuses. While there are many toll bridges efficiently built and operated, on the whole the public is paying an extortionate charge.

It is estimated that the total investment in the 233 toll bridges that were in operation on October 31, 1927, is approximately $118,000,000, of which about $45,000,000 is in publicly owned and $73,000,000 in privately owned structures. Bridges previously listed as under construction on the same date involved a further investment of nearly $116,000,000, of which nearly $75,000,000 is in the nine publicly owned and $41,000,000 in the privately owned structures. The probable additional investment in 162 structures known to have been contemplated at the time of the bureau's survey was estimated at approximately $313,000,000, of which nearly $255,000,000 was for privately projected bridges and about $58,000,000 for bridges proposed for public operation.

Summarizing these figures, it appears that the total capital already invested or probably to be invested in the 424 bridges which were in operation, under construction, or known to be in contemplation on October 31, 1927, was approximately $547,000,000.

EARN 11 PER CENT ON CAPITAL

Information obtained with reference to the earnings of the 233 toll bridges that were in operation at the time of the bureau's survey shows that these bridges, which were built at an estimated cost of $118,000,000, earned in 1926 a net operating income of $13,809,000, or 11.7 per cent of the estimated cost. This is the income after deduction of all usual operating expenses, but before deduction to cover depreciation and interest on the funded and unfunded debt.

Of the above total, the earnings of the 42 publicly owned bridges was $3,611,000, an amount which was approximately 8 per cent of the estimated cost of $45,000,000. The $10,198,000 earned by the 191 privately owned bridges in operation was 13.9 per cent of the estimated cost of $73,000,000. These are average figures for 233 structures.

It appears from this that privately owned bridges are earning 13.9 per cent upon their cost, and the publicly owned bridges earn 8 per cent. I think that the Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee ought to take notice of this statement, for it is of some importance in considering railroad valuation and railroad earnings. Both figures are excessive when we consider the American proposition in its broadest sense. The American people are producing only 5½ per cent of new wealth per year. That is the figure given by Mr. Hoover as to the increase of wealth since 1912. All the work of all the people, all the earnings of all capital, all the increase in property values, and all of this added to the depreciation of the dollar shows that there is only produced by our American country 5½ per cent of new wealth each year. If it all went to capital, that would be the limit of capital's return on an even division. But here in the case of toll bridges, we have these blocks of capital invested in a public service, in stable enterprises, that ought to be satisfied with the lowest rate of return, and yet the public is required to pay them from 8 to 13.9 per cent on the averages of the two kinds of bridges.

Our railroads get a guaranty by command of the law that the commission shall levy rates upon the people to earn enough to give them 6 per cent and later 5¾ per cent upon their valuation, and there are $7,000,000,000 of water in their capitalization over and above their market value at the time the first $18,900,000,000 value was established.

This 5½ per cent of total production is the most important economic proposition for the Congress of the United States to consider in regulating all of these matters. The Supreme Court is now passing upon a case involving the valuation of the railroads, but I have not heard a word said about a comparison with the new wealth produced by the people each year. The comparison will be made with banks that earn a much higher per cent or with industries that earn a still higher per cent, but the American Nation is one people and the basis of comparison should be the average for all the people. The basis of figuring toll-bridge earnings is the average earnings of all the people of the United States. We have seen that that figure does not exceed 5½ per cent, and that gives every dollar of new wealth that is produced by the people of this country to capital alone. I maintain capital is not entitled to all of it. Capital is entitled to a just share, but it is not entitled to everything that is produced in our country. Labor and invention and genius and management all should have some share, and that would reduce the average considerably below 5½ per cent. Toll bridges are not entitled to exceed this rate, but they do exceed it by 200 or 300 per cent.

Mr. President, the soundest economic reasons demand that the public make these bridges free. It would lower the interest rate, save a large amount in the expense of operation and collection of tolls, besides being of great value in speeding up the traffic.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. BROOKHART. I am just about through. I wish the Senator would wait until I finish.

Mr. BLACK. If the Senator prefers to proceed, I will withdraw the suggestion.

Mr. BROOKHART. I will finish in five minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama withdraw his suggestion?

Mr. BLACK. I withdraw it, as the Senator desires to conclude.

Mr. BROOKHART. I have introduced two bills covering the toll-bridge question for the whole United States. One of them embodies an amortization plan whereby the cost of the bridges will be collected in tolls and the bridges will then be made free. I think that form has been adopted by the committee and that the new bills are all drafted on that basis. I introduced this bill after consultation with the Bureau of Public Roads in the Department of Agriculture. The other bill I have introduced on my own account, providing for the use of $35,000,000 a year from the Public Treasury for the condemnation of toll bridges for the purpose of making them at once free. In view of the small amount the Federal Government is paying in the aid of roads, this is a very moderate demand.

Objection is made by a few States to Government taxes for building public highways. They point out that a large Government tax is paid by certain States and only a small percentage of it goes back in Federal aid to roads in these States. However, they neglect to point out also that these same States earn enormous profits in their industries which do business in all the States, including those which pay a small Government tax. In fact, these States paying the big Government tax on corporation profits and on incomes derive very much the largest share of their incomes from outside their own State, and then when it comes to taxing the same incomes to build roads in the States where they were earned they object. The objection is not sound. There are only seven or eight of these States, and they are outnumbered in both the Senate and the House as well as outpointed by all the facts of the case. Their objection is therefore invalid on its merits, nor can it be sustained by numbers in Congress.

If the country will rise up to the importance of this whole question and present these facts to the Congress, the laws which I have described can be speedily enacted. I now yield the floor.

J. H. B. WILDER

Mr. KING. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the votes by which the bill (S. 5715) for the relief of J. H. B. Wilder was on yesterday ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed. It is a bill in which the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] is interested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion will be entered.

WILLIAM S. WELCH

Mr. KING. I also enter a motion to reconsider the votes whereby the bill (S. 2127) for the relief of William S. Welch, trustee of the estate of the Joliet Forge Co., Joliet, Ill., bankrupt, was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion will be entered.

Mr. KING. I also ask that the House be requested to return the bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The House will be requested to return the bills.

FEDERAL RADIO COMMISSION

Mr. WATSON. I ask that the unfinished business may be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate House bill No. 15430.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15430) continuing the powers and authority of the Federal Radio Commission under the radio act of 1927, and for other purposes.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I shall say but very little about this measure. It has been discussed until all Senators who are interested in it are fairly familiar with the provisions of the bill. It is just such a measure as we passed two years ago, and just such a one as we passed a year ago, continuing the life of the Radio Commission for another year.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, ought we not to have a quorum?

Mr. WATSON. The Senator has a right to call one, if he so desires.

Mr. COPELAND. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York notes the absence of a quorum. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Edwards	King	Simmons
Barkley	Fess	McKellar	Smith
Bayard	Fletcher	McMaster	Smoot
Bingham	Frazier	McNary	Steck
Black	George	Mayfield	Steiwer

Blease	Glass	Moses	Swanson
Borah	Glenn	Neely	Thomas, Idaho
Bratton	Goff	Norbeck	Thomas, Okla.
Brookhart	Gould	Norris	Trammell
Broussard	Greene	Nye	Tydings
Bruce	Hale	Oddie	Tyson
Burton	Harris	Pine	Vandenberg
Capper	Harrison	Ransdell	Wagner

Curtis	Heflin	Robinson, Ind.	Waterman
Dale	Johnson	Sackett	Watson
Deneen	Jones	Schall	Wheeler
Dill	Kendrick	Sheppard
Edge	Keyes	Shortridge

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I have stated that Senators, as a rule, are so familiar with this measure that I do not need to discuss it. Those who take any interest in it are informed, and those who do not take any interest will not pay any attention to it anyhow; and I, therefore, shall not take up the time of the Senate in any extended discussion of the measure.

This is simply a proposition to extend the life of the Radio Commission for another year. We passed such a bill two years ago, and another one one year ago; and we think the conditions justify the enactment of this measure at this time. If we do not pass it, the control of this agency will be thrown back into the Department of Commerce, and they themselves say they are not in a position to take it and handle it properly. Therefore, we think the only thing to do is to pass this measure.

I have nothing more to say and am ready for a vote.

I desire to say to the Senate that I intend to insist that this body shall remain in continuous session until this measure shall have been disposed of.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I heard what the Senator from Indiana said. I send to the desk an amendment which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 9, after the word "period," it is proposed to strike out "of three years after the first meeting of the commission" and insert "until June 1, 1929."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York.

Mr. WATSON. May we hear it stated once more? I did not catch it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will restate the amendment.

The amendment was restated.

Mr. COPELAND obtained the floor.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. COPELAND. I do not wish to lose my position on the floor.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. With the permission of the Senator, I should like to offer for the RECORD, in connection with this debate, a statement concerning certain international aspects of radio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

SUGGESTIONS CONCERNING CERTAIN INTERNATIONAL ASPECTS OF RADIO

The major international difficulties relating to radio result from a lack of sufficient channels or wave lengths to serve the world's needs.

In the autumn of 1927 some 82 nations participated in the International Radio Telegraph Conference, at Washington, in an attempt to settle some of these difficulties. The nations agreed in allocating the available frequencies as between various uses, i. e. broadcasting, beacons, direction finding, amateur, experimental, air navigation, maritime, and services between fixed points, but whenever they approached a division of available frequencies between nations, a strong nationalistic spirit and a high sense of sovereignty in nations, large and small, prevented such division or any serious discussion of it. Each nation considered that it had equal sovereign rights with the others and had there been an attempt to divide the frequencies available for each use between the several nations, chaos would have come and the conference would never have been at an end.

The conference concerned communications. Perhaps a just method of dividing frequencies between the nations would have been to divide them in proportion to the volume of message traffic of each nation, but this suggestion received little encouragement.

The conference so left the situation that every nation has equal sovereign rights with every other nation to allocate any frequency for any purpose.

The parties in article 8 of the convention they signed did agree that "so far as practicable" stations they established should not interfere with radio communications or services of others, but no means were provided for determining how interferences should be ended, save through international arbitration as provided in article 18. Article 5, section 16, of the general regulations, however, seems to establish the principle that priority of use creates a priority in right. The section provides:

"The frequencies assigned by administrations to all new fixed land or radio broadcasting stations which they may have authorized or of which they may have undertaken the installation must be chosen in such a manner as to prevent, so far as practicable, interference with international services already carried on by existing stations, the frequencies of which have already been notified to the International Bureau. In the case of a change of the frequency on an existing fixed land or broadcasting station, the new frequency assigned to the station must comply with the above provisions.

"2. The interested governments shall agree in case of need upon the determination of the waves to be assigned to the stations in question as well as upon the conditions for the use of waves so assigned. If no arrangement intended to eliminate interference can be arrived at, the provisions of article 18 of the convention may be applied."

International complications promise first to arise from interference in radiotelegraph communication. International broadcasting, television, picture transmission, and other radio services, will bring complications enough in time, but radiotelegraphy is now, and for many years it has been, an accomplished fact.

International radiotelegraph is carried on:

(1) Long-wave bands of low frequencies.

(2) "Continental" bands of frequencies, 1,500 to 6,000 kilocycles.

(3) "International" bands of very high frequencies, 6,000 to 23,000 kilocycles.

Long waves of low frequencies can only be used in very high-powered stations of long range. These stations are complicated and expensive. They were the first stations used in radiotelegraphy. Successful international communication can now be carried on with simpler devices using high frequencies and low power, and it is, therefore, little likely that any more high-power, long-wave stations will be built in the world. Long waves of low frequencies have world-wide range. Duplicate use of such frequencies can not be made in the world. One station's use of such frequency must be exclusive.

The "continental" bands, 1,500 to 6,000 kilocycles, are effective for intermediate distances. These bands are useful for communication between fixed points on one continent only, it being possible to duplicate a few of the frequencies once on a single continent and to use most of them once only on each continent.

"International" bands of very high frequencies, 6,000 to 23,000 kilocycles, are of world-wide range. Two stations can not successfully use any of these frequencies simultaneously, however widely separated in the world such stations may be. The use of such frequencies must be exclusive.

The United States has allocated certain frequencies for use in the "continental" band and other frequencies for use in the "international" band. Allocations already made plus pending applications exceed by far the reasonable share of the United States in these bands; they nearly, if not quite, equal all the frequencies available for the use of the whole world. Congestion in the American broadcasting band is well known, but a congestion perhaps greater still in the bands useful for international communication is not so generally understood.

In this situation it becomes necessary for the United States carefully to formulate and consistently to apply correct principles:

(1) In allocating frequencies to American organizations for use in the "continental" or the "international" field; and

(2) In agreeing with foreign nations concerning division of frequencies in the "continental" or the "international" field.

The principle to be applied in awarding frequencies to American organizations for use in the "continental" or the "international" fields would appear to be the following:

"No frequency should be granted for communication between fixed points to any organization unless that organization has adequate facilities and has the obligation under the law to accept messages from the public and to serve any and every one of the public equally and fairly and without discrimination."

"Adequate facilities" should be deemed to include legal rights, patent and other, sufficient to insure the prompt beginning of service and its continued operation. "Adequate facilities," naturally, should include technical devices, technical equipment, and technical skill sufficient promptly and continuously to carry on service. Every nation has equal right with every other one to award these channels to its nationals, and unless the American licensee be in position promptly to begin and continuously to carry on service, an award of the same frequency made by a foreign country would take precedence over the American award and a frequency allocated to an American organization not in position to use it would not be a frequency saved to the United States, but would likely be one lost.

Foreign countries are establishing rights in frequencies by using them, and to the extent that the United States shall allocate frequencies to organizations not in position to make prompt and continuous use of them, to that extent will such an allocation intended to conserve American rights in reality imperil them.

No frequency should be allocated to any organization that has not demonstrated its ability to make efficient use of the facility it seeks. The public interest would require this. Until an organization has demonstrated its technical competence, the efficiency of apparatus at its disposal, the stability and scope of its international relations, its financial ability, and the sufficiency of its legal rights, patent and other, to render to the public satisfactory service, no frequency could be safely given to such an organization. In the international scramble for frequencies they can not be kept unused, and not only a legal obligation to use the frequencies in the public interest but a demonstrated ability so to use them should be a condition of their granting.

No channel can be kept unused to gather dust on the shelf. Some other nation will surely award it and use it, and the organization and the country which does not actually and continuously use a frequency it seeks to retain will very likely lose it, for the International Radio Telegraph Convention, Washington, 1927, gives approval to the principle that prior use gives better right.

The public-utility principle that all channels shall be impressed with a public trust so that all the public may be equally served should also be applied in awarding frequencies. In no other way can the frequencies, all too few, be made to serve equally all the public. If a frequency be awarded to carry the private communications of one organization, it is little likely that such a frequency would be used to capacity. To the extent it is not used or to the extent its use gives one better service than his neighbor, to that extent preference and discrimination result.

If a frequency be granted to the exclusive use of one banker, broker, trader, manufacturer, or other private organization, by what principle may any other like organization be denied like privilege? Should the United States award a frequency to the exclusive use of one organization, frequencies being all too few, it would itself become the instrument of discrimination contrary to the principles of good government and contrary to the fundamental principles underlying the Federal radio act of 1927.

The people of the United States are coming to realize that too many competing railroads are not in the public interest. The public's money is invested in competing facilities and the public's money is lost when, there being too many competitors, some must fail. Even those who survive may not find patronage sufficient for reasonable profit and therefore may not be in position to give efficient service.

The people of the United States are coming even more to realize that it is not in the public interest to establish many competing telephone organizations. The reasons applicable to railroads are equally applicable to telephones, and in addition those who subscribe to competing telephone organizations have no means for intercommunication.

Principles applicable to both railroads and telephones are equally applicable to radio, and in addition:

It is physically possible to duplicate railroads and physically possible to duplicate telephone lines, but it is not physically possible in international radio service to make duplicate use of frequencies, and the frequencies available are all too few to serve the world's needs. A principle which would be wisely applied in allocating frequencies to American organizations for use in the "continental" and in the "international" fields would be, therefore, not to divide frequencies among too many organizations; not to attempt to establish many services, lest none have facilities sufficient to maintain effective service.

In agreeing with foreign nations concerning division of frequencies in the "continental" or the "international" fields, care should be exercised to be sure that all nations concerned in the division are present and agreeing. If all be present, it would seem appropriate that division should be made on the basis of traffic volume, but countries somewhat less developed than others might well object that however just it might be in this generation to apply only the factor of traffic volume, it might work injustice in the generations to come. Having regard to this, therefore, it would appear that if the factors of sovereignty, area, population, and traffic volume were all taken into account and a division made on the basis of a combination of all these factors, then just results might be arrived at for this generation and those to come.

Illustration of an accord which would not appear to be based upon carefully formulated principles is to be found in the accord reported to have been made between the United States and Canada.

This accord concerned "continental" bands. The report is to the effect that the interests of Mexico and Cuba were somewhat considered, but not those of any other country in the West Indies or in Central America; that such countries were not parties; that after setting aside a limited number of channels for Mexico and Cuba, it has been agreed that the remainder shall be divided on some such basis as 60 per cent to the United States and 40 per cent to Canada.

The United States has twelve times the population of Canada and much more than twelve times her volume of message traffic. Mexico has 50 per cent more population than Canada and perhaps equal prospect with Canada for a future increase in wealth, population, and traffic volume. Many countries in the West Indies and in Central America have an equal interest with the United States and Canada in the disposition of "continental" bands and an equal sovereign right with the United States or Canada to dispose of them, yet in the accord reported it does not appear that these countries were represented or their interests provided for, while the frequencies disposed of, if used by the countries parties to the accord, will exhaust the frequencies available and deny any service in these bands to many countries in the West Indies and in Central America.

Canada is far removed from the West Indies and from Central America. In the accord reported Canada received a smaller portion of the longer-range frequencies, but the lion's share of the shorter-range frequencies. Canada can, therefore, very likely use all the frequencies obtained by her in the accord without interfering with any West Indian or Central American country. The United States, however, lies midway between all the countries concerned, and the almost inevitable protest against the accord and against interferences which will result will come from West Indian and Central American countries and will be directed not against Canada, but against the United States. A proper sense of justice will demand that the United States make provision for the countries excluded, and this provision she will likely be compelled to make by a further diminution of the frequencies at her disposal, already unduly diminished by a too-generous allocation to Canada.

Unless arrangements be made applying carefully formulated principles, errors will inevitably be made whenever an international division of frequencies is attempted. Equitable division of frequencies is vital to American communications and commerce, and errors once made in international arrangements of this character likely can never be rectified.

The United States, unlike most foreign countries, is not engaged as a Government in carrying on commercial communications service. The United States, therefore, should be reluctant to enter into international arrangements without giving American communications organizations vitally concerned the opportunity to be heard in such discussions and to participate in them.

Mr. COPELAND addressed the Senate. After having spoken for some time—

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TYSON in the chair). The Senator will please suspend while the Senate receives a message from the House of Representatives.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House insisted on its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to Senate amendment No. 39 to the bill (H. R. 15089) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes; agreed to the further conference requested by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. CRAMTON, Mr. MURPHY, and Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado were appointed managers on the part of the House at the further conference.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12650) for the relief of John F. Fleming.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12106) to erect a national monument at Cowpens battle ground.

FEDERAL RADIO COMMISSION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15430) continuing the powers and authority of the Federal Radio Commission under the radio act of 1927, and for other purposes.

Mr. COPELAND resumed his speech. After having spoken with interruptions for two hours—

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, as there are 11 Senators present——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GLENN in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. COPELAND. For what purpose?

Mr. BLEASE. For the purpose of asking for a quorum. There are 11 Senators present. I do not think the Senate ought to transact business without an actual physical quorum being present.

Mr. COPELAND. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. BLEASE. I suggest the absence of a quorum, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules that no business has been transacted since the last quorum call.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama raised the point that there had been business transacted on two occasions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair ruled against him.

Mr. BLEASE. Then I move that we take a recess for a half hour, to go and get something to eat, and it may be something else.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield for that purpose?

Mr. COPELAND. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina moves that the Senate take a recess for 30 minutes.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Does the Senator from New York yield for that purpose?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York has yielded for that purpose. [Putting the question.] The noes have it.

Mr. BLEASE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SCHALL (when Mr. SHIPSTEAD'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] is ill and confined to his room. I will let this announcement stand for the rest of the day.

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 6, nays 52, as follows:

YEAS—6

Blaine	Bruce	George	Waterman
Brookhart	Dale

NAYS—52

Barkley	Black	Broussard	Copeland

So the Senate refused to take a recess.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. I desire at this time to present a cloture petition which I send to the desk.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON. I am presenting a cloture petition.

Mr. COPELAND. I have the floor. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, this is a privileged matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules that the Senator from New York yielded the floor for a motion to take a recess, and that the Senator from Indiana has the floor.

Mr. WATSON. In addition to that, I am offering a privileged motion.

Mr. COPELAND. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate? [Putting the question.] The "ayes" have it, and the decision of the Chair is sustained.

The Senator from Indiana has the floor. The Secretary will read the cloture petition presented by the Senator from Indiana.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

We, the undersigned Senators, in accordance with the provisions of Rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, move that debate be brought to a close upon the bill (H. R. 15430) continuing the powers and authority of the Federal Radio Commission under the radio act of 1927, and for other purposes:

JAMES E. WATSON.	H. D. STEPHENS.
TASKER L. ODDIE.	F. M. SIMMONS.
SIMEON D. FESS.	F. E. WARREN.
OTIS F. GLENN.	W. L. JONES.
GUY D. GOFF.	GEO. H. MOSES.
ARTHUR R. ROBINSON.	FREDERICK HALE.
EARLE B. MAYFIELD.	DANIEL O. HASTINGS.
KENNETH MCKELLAR.	ARTHUR CAPPER.
PARK TRAMMELL.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, while this matter may not be brought up until day after to-morrow, under the rule——

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. EDWARDS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield for that purpose?

Mr. EDWARDS. It does not make any difference whether he yields or not; I have a right to suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair holds that the Senator has no right to take the Senator from Indiana from the floor unless he yields.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WATSON. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator for that purpose if he desires.

Mr. BLEASE. Under the rules, this matter can not be considered on the same day that it is offered. I object to its consideration.

Mr. WATSON. I did not understand the Senator.

Mr. BLEASE. I say that under the rules cloture can not be put into effect on the same day that the petition for cloture is offered.

Mr. WATSON. Certainly not.

Mr. BLEASE. I rise to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. WATSON. I am not seeking to put cloture into effect, I may say——

Mr. BLEASE. I object to the consideration of this matter now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair rules that the Senator from Indiana has not asked for immediate consideration.

Mr. WATSON. I have the floor.

Mr. BLEASE. I understand, but if the Senator is out of order, he has not the floor.

Mr. WATSON. Yes; I have the floor.

Mr. BLEASE. We will let the Chair rule whether he has or not.

Mr. WATSON. The Chair has recognized me.

Mr. BLEASE. I do not propose to submit to any gag law now, and you might as well understand that now, either from Illinois or Indiana or anywhere else.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair——

Mr. BLEASE. I propounded a parliamentary inqury. I want an answer. This question is not in order for consideration for 24 hours.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair rules that the Senator from South Carolina has not propounded a parliamentary inquiry but has stated a proposition.

Mr. BLEASE. I now ask the Chair to rule whether this question is properly before the Senate or if it can be considered before to-morrow?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair rules that it can not be considered before to-morrow.

Mr. WATSON. Certainly not.

Mr. COPELAND. A parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. WATSON. I have the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York will state his inquiry.

Mr. COPELAND. Of course, the Senator is not advised as to the rule——

The VICE PRESIDENT. To which Senator does the Senator from New York refer?

Mr. COPELAND. This cloture motion can not be considered until Monday.

Mr. MOSES. It can be considered on Sunday.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I am seeking to explain it. Have I the floor?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana has the floor.

Mr. WATSON. Having the floor, I have the right to say what I please as long as I keep within the rules. My good friend from South Carolina is entirely mistaken as to what I intended to do. I am not seeking to apply any gag rule. I am simply stating that the matter can not come up until to-morrow under the rule.

Mr. MOSES. It can not come up until day after to-morrow under the rule.

Mr. WATSON. It might require a Sunday session, but, so far as I am concerned, I am so determined on the passage of this bill that, if necessary, we shall have a Sunday session in order to consummate it.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, if necessary to keep some people from being confirmed, we will stay here all day Sunday, although we are Methodists.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator is no more Methodist than I am.

Mr. BLEASE. I do not care anything about the bill; it is the things behind that radio bill I am fighting.

Mr. NORRIS. Since we are going to have a Sunday session, I suggest that the chaplain be notified, so that we can open it properly.

Mr. WATSON. We will notify the chaplain. But, to be serious about it, this is the only way in which we can be absolutely sure of the passage of this bill, if the Senator from New York persists in his filibuster.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. WATSON. Yes; for a question.

Mr. COPELAND. Is the Senator making a speech on the bill?

Mr. WATSON. I am making a speech, and I am yielding for a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. WATSON. For a question.

Mr. COPELAND. I will put it in the form of a question.

Mr. WATSON. Very well.

Mr. COPELAND. Does the Senator from Indiana give me credit for being able to keep this going until Sunday? If he does, I certainly thank him from the bottom of my heart, and I never saw JIM WATSON frightened before. Is he frightened?

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I do not think that the Senator can continue this night on the floor, but this is a club, and I intend to use it if I have to. Therefore, all I want to say is that unless the Senator will yield, and one man cease to defy the rule of 94 others, I shall apply this cloture if it be absolutely necessary to do it. I do not want to do it; I hope my genial friend from New York, who ought by this time to have satisfied his conscience, will yield, and permit a clear majority in the Senate evidently favoring this measure to have its way, as it is entitled to have.

If it were not the closing of a short session, even my genial friend from New York would not take the floor to engage in a one-man filibuster, as he has done against this proposition.

Mr. COPELAND rose.

Mr. WATSON. I yield for a question.

Mr. COPELAND. I wish the Senate would bear with me under unanimous consent for just a word or two. It would not have made any difference to me——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield for this purpose?

Mr. WATSON. I yield for a question.

Mr. COPELAND. I ask unanimous consent to say just a word.

Mr. WATSON. Then I object. Mr. President, I have not offered this petition for the purpose of introducing gag rule. This is offered under one of the rules of the Senate. Its object is well understood. Its purpose is well defined. But I am presenting it with the distinct understanding that if a majority of the Senate which I know favors this bill will stay with me on the proposition, we will exhaust the Senator from New York personally, if need be, and if that can not be done, then we will apply the cloture rule. That is all I care to say on the subject.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAINE. I would like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. WATSON. I yield.

Mr. BLAINE. If this request, closing debate, is voted by a two-thirds vote of the Senate, that must be done after we take an adjournment to-day, as I understand it.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator is right.

Mr. BLAINE. Does the Senator contemplate taking an adjournment this evening some time?

Mr. WATSON. That is my understanding.

Mr. HALE. An adjournment?

Mr. WATSON. What is the rule? Does it not read the next "calendar day" but one?

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WATSON. I have not the exact language of the rule before me. The rule says a "calendar day," and we do not have to adjourn.

Mr. BINGHAM. Let me read the rule.

Mr. WATSON. I would like to have the Senator read the rule for the information of the Senate.

Mr. BINGHAM. The second part of Rule XXII is as follows:

> If at any time a motion, signed by 16 Senators, to bring to a close the debate upon any pending measure is presented to the Senate, the presiding officer shall at once state the motion to the Senate, and one hour after the Senate meets on the following calendar day but one, he shall lay the motion before the Senate and direct that the Secretary call the roll, and, upon the ascertainment that a quorum is present, the presiding officer shall, without debate, submit to the Senate by an aye and nay vote the question:
> "Is it the sense of the Senate that the debate shall be brought to a close?"

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BROOKHART. I desire to propound a parliamentary inquiry as to the interpretation of the rule just read. It says, "On the following calendar day but one." That would mean that the day after to-morrow, then, this would be presented.

Mr. WATSON. On Sunday.

Mr. BROOKHART. At 1 o'clock Sunday. I understood, from some of the previous remarks, that it could be done to-morrow, that that claim was made, and that was the point I wanted straightened out.

Mr. WATSON. I do not think so. Under the rule the Presiding Officer is required to state the question. The motion for cloture has been filed and been read, and, as I remember the rule—I am not quite clear on it, not having read it for a long time—the Presiding Officer is to state the question at once.

The VICE PRESIDENT. All that is necessary at this time, the filing of the petition and the announcement and the reading of the motion.

Mr. WATSON. Very well. I now yield the floor.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state the inquiry.

Mr. BINGHAM. Under the part of Rule XXII just read, is it correct that, Sunday counting as one calendar day, the motion that the Senate proceed to the vote under the cloture rule could be made on Sunday?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senate is in legislative session on Sunday, the motion can be made.

Mr. BLEASE. I think they lost 24 hours by offering this, Mr. President; but it is all right.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. FRAZIER. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement in regard to the Mississippi River flood control.

Mr. BLEASE. I object.

Mr. COPELAND. A parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. COPELAND. What has the Chair determined about the cloture rule; that it will take effect on Monday?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The cloture motion will be laid before the Senate on Sunday if it is in legislative session on that day.

Mr. COPELAND. That is, if it is in legislative session on Sunday?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If it is in legislative session on Sunday, the question will be put to the Senate one hour after it meets, and a vote taken thereon.

Mr. BLEASE. Is it the purpose to lay it aside now?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the rules it is laid aside when notice is given. On Sunday, if the Senate is in legislative session, one hour after the Senate convenes, the Chair will put the question as to whether it is the sense of the Senate that debate should be closed.

Mr. COPELAND. A parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. COPELAND. Did the Presiding Officer say that the radio bill would be laid aside under this motion?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; but all questions relating to the cloture petition will be laid aside until that time.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I wish to ask for a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. BLEASE. I object.

Mr. MOSES. Let me state it first, please.

Mr. BLEASE. I am not going to let anything go through by unanimous consent until this cloture is voted on, if I can help it.

Mr. MOSES. Let me state it.

Mr. BLEASE. That is positive; it does not make any difference what it is.

Mr. MOSES. Will the Senator withhold that until I state my request?

Mr. BLEASE. That is a positive statement. If we are going to have gag rule, we are going to have it if one man can put it on. I am going to object to any unanimous consent on anything until this cloture rule is passed, if I can do it.

Mr. MOSES. Then it appears to me that an unpopular postmaster will be forced upon a town in North Carolina.

Mr. BLEASE. I can not help it. North Carolina went Republican anyhow. [Laughter.]

Mr. BINGHAM. A parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BINGHAM. The rule states that one hour after the Senate meets on the following calendar day but one, the Presiding Officer shall lay the motion before the Senate. In case the Senate is in session Saturday night at midnight, and continues in session throughout Saturday night, would the Presiding Officer then be justified in laying the motion before the Senate at 1 o'clock a. m. Sunday morning?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I suggest to the Chair that that is a hypothetical question, and that the Chair is not required to rule on every hypothetical question that is submitted to him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is prepared to rule, as far as that is concerned.

Mr. WATSON. What is the ruling?

Mr. BINGHAM. I hope the Chair will rule, as we have seen night sessions recently which were not hypothetical.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senate is in session at 12 o'clock midnight Saturday, and continues until 1 o'clock a. m., the motion would be put.

Mr. WATSON. I now ask for a vote on the radio bill.

Mr. HEFLIN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York is recognized. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, as I was saying——

Mr. HEFLIN. I would like to ask the Senator a question, without affecting his right to the floor——

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am sorry I can not yield to my genial friend from Alabama. If I do, I will be ruled off the floor, and then I would lose my second chance.

Mr. HEFLIN. No——

Mr. COPELAND. I must not take any chance. I can not yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. I will state that if the Senator yields, he will not yield the floor.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I wish to read further from the radio address of Mr. Lewis G. Caldwell, counsel of the Radio Commission. When I was interrupted I was discussing——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McNARY in the chair). Let there be order in the Chamber, please.

Mr. COPELAND resumed and concluded his speech, which is as follows:

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, when we took up the radio matter for consideration two years ago, after extended hearings and much discussion, a bill was determined upon and enacted into law. That law prescribed that for a period of one year after its enactment all of the work of supervising the radio problem should be in the hands of a commission. The commission was to have original jurisdiction and administration of the details of radio and also to act as an appeal board from its acts as an administrative body. Commissioners were appointed, and they proceeded to act under the law.

Last year we saw fit to continue the full powers of the commission, both as an appellate body and also as an administrative body. It was argued by the able Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] and the distinguished Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] that it was wise to continue the original year's work by having all the powers in the Radio Commission. Now it is proposed that we should continue for another year this complicated situation.

I want Senators to understand that there is no difference of opinion between the present position of Senators who are advocating this bill and the present speaker except as to the date of the termination of the dual arrangement which has been in existence since the inception of the commission. As I shall attempt to develop in my talk, it is my feeling that the present arrangement is an unhappy one and an unwise one, and that it does not make for the large development of this growing institution as it should.

After full consideration originally, it was felt that many legal questions would arise, many controversies would require settlement, and it would be necessary to have a review of the acts of the technicians who might pass upon the original orders issued by the board.

I want it understood, Mr. President, that I have no criticism to pass upon the Radio Commission. In my opinion, the country has been blest by having upon that body a number of men who have had an eye single to the best interests of the Nation. They have dealt with the problem intelligently. They have been diligent in attention to their duty. In my judgment, they have accomplished a very fine piece of work for the United States.

The purely administrative features involved in the development of the radio industry have now been completed, at least to the extent of 80 or 85 per cent, according to the testimony of Mr. Caldwell, one of the commissioners who has just retired from office. Before passing on to a discussion of the question at issue here, I wish to speak about Commissioner Caldwell. In my judgment, he is better informed on the subject of radio in all of its ramifications than any other man in the world. He was a radio fan from the beginning, and was for years the editor of the leading magazine devoted to the radio industry. He is an engineer, and possesses all the technical, educational, and scientific requirements to enable him to fill a place such as that he has held for these two years, qualities which very few men in the world could match. Mr. Caldwell is resigning from the commission to resume the editorship of the magazine with which he is connected. He testified at length, both before the House committee and before the Senate committee, on the accomplishments of the commission, and on the needs of the future. I speak of this because before the discussion is ended I shall read into the RECORD some of the statements he has made.

It is needless to say that I would not undertake to express any views of my own, because what I personally know about the subject might not be of any particular importance to the country, but I hope to use my voice to convey to the country the opinions of the real experts of this industry.

The United States Daily, in its issues of yesterday and to-day, contains a very enlightening statement regarding the legal aspects of the radio industry, an article founded upon a speech made by Mr. Caldwell before one of the law associations, and the Mr. Caldwell of whom I am speaking now is not the commissioner but the attorney of the Radio Commission. I do not wish to have Senators confused regarding the two men. They bear the same name, but the Caldwell of whom I am speaking now is the legal adviser of the Radio Commission.

This address of Mr. Caldwell's is well worthy of attentive reading by every Member of the Senate, and from time to time, as the argument develops, I shall read parts at least of it to the Senate. There will not be many Senators here at the time, but perhaps to-morrow morning some of them may do me the honor of reading this material.

I do not blame any Senator for absenting himself from the Senate at this particular time, and spending his time in the sunshine. I confess that I would rather do that myself than to be here; but I really have a sense of duty to the country, and I am going to stay here.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I think there should be order in the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRATTON in the chair). The Senator from New York will suspend until the Senate is in order. Senators will please take their seats. Conversation in the rear of the Senate will cease.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. BROUSSARD. House bill 16666 has passed the House, and has just been reported by a Senate committee. I would like to ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. CURTIS. Let it be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will not the Senator from Louisiana send the bill to the desk?

Mr. BROUSSARD. It is House bill 16666. I would say to the Senator from Kansas that it has passed the House.

Mr. CURTIS. What is it about?

Mr. BROUSSARD. It provides relief for the widow of a man who was killed by an ambulance belonging to the United States Government.

Mr. CURTIS. Has it been unanimously reported?

Mr. BROUSSARD. It has.

Mr. CURTIS. Is it recommended by the department?

Mr. BROUSSARD. It is.

Mr. DILL. I wish the Senator would not ask for the consideration of that bill now, because another Senator has asked me not to permit any legislation to be passed other than bridge bills. I told him that while he was out I would not permit any other legislation to be passed, and I wish the Senator would wait until that Senator returns.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, what is going on? I would like to be informed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana has requested unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a bill, to which the Senator from Washington interposed an objection. The Senator from New York is recognized.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am sorry to see any anxiety on the part of the Senator from Indiana. He need not be at all disturbed. I shall take no unfair advantage of him in any way whatever, and I know that he will be as generous to me.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, the Senator is very kind, and I appreciate his friendly interest, as well as his self-effacement, but I am well aware of the fact that one of the best ways in the world to kill time is to yield to everybody who wants to bring something up, because the whole Senate is filled with gentlemen with that desire.

Mr. COPELAND. Does the Senator desire to kill time?

Mr. WATSON. No; but I do not want the Senator from New York to kill time.

Mr. COPELAND. As far as I am concerned, Mr. President, I have nothing but time, and if Senators have any measures which need attention, far be it from me to interfere with their desires.

This matter of how the radio business was to be handled was thoroughly discussed, and I think one of the most illuminating statements made regarding it was made by Mr. Herbert Hoover. I have no doubt that the Senator from Indiana, who was one of his ardent supporters in his pre-election campaign——

Mr. DENEEN. Mr. President——

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. DENEEN. Out of order I ask unanimous consent, as in executive session, to send to the Committee on the Judiciary the nomination of Mr. Charles A. Woodward for judge of the district court of the northern district of Illinois.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination——

Mr. WATSON. What is that?

Mr. DENEEN. I have asked to have a nomination sent to the Committee on the Judiciary for its consideration at 3 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WATSON. That is all right.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. FESS. Does not the Senator from New York yield the floor on such occasions as this?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair would hold that he does not.

Mr. FESS. Does the Chair desire a citation of the rule that whenever any Senator who has the floor yields for anything like offering an amendment or presenting a request for a unanimous-consent agreement or permitting the introduction of bills, he yields the floor? Does the Chair desire any citation of the rule?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If a rigid enforcement of the rule is desired, the Chair will hold that the Senator having the floor yields the floor under such circumstances; but following the custom that has prevailed thus far in the day's proceedings, and in the absence of notice of rigid enforcement of the rule, the Chair will hold that the Senator from New York has the floor.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I did not wish to insist upon a rigid enforcement of the rule. I thought perhaps we would reach the point in the filibuster where we would like to have a ruling on that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would hold that under a rigid interpretation of the rule the Senator from New York would yield the floor if he yielded for such purposes.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, what was the inquiry, if I might inquire of the Chair? I could not hear the Senator from Ohio. I should like to be advised regarding any possible infringement of my rights, and nobody is better qualified to speak along that line than is the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, my inquiry was to this effect: If the Senator who has the floor yields for an amendment to a bill or to some Senator to introduce a resolution or to submit a unanimous-consent request, if we were rigidly to enforce the rule that would take the Senator from the floor. The reason why I am making the inquiry is that while I have no desire to do it, and shall not, yet if there is a filibuster on the bill we may be compelled to resort to that action and enforce the rule as to no Senator being permitted to speak more than twice on the same bill in the same day. That is the purpose. I want to be frank and fair about it.

Mr. COPELAND. On the same bill or amendment?

Mr. FESS. Yes; and in case amendments are being offered which are evidently and obviously and simply a matter of dilatoriness, then we may be called upon to enforce the rule with reference to dilatory amendments. I shall not take any action of that sort, but this being so close to the end of the session and some of us thinking this measure quite important we may feel influenced to demand a rigid enforcement of the rule. I shall not do it, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am very glad to hear that the Senator will not indulge in a filibuster against the bill. I am anxious to have the discussion go forward, so the matter may be dealt with and concluded, and I hope I will have the cooperation of Senators in that respect. I am well aware of the attitude of the Senator from Ohio. When he occupies the chair, as he will no doubt do later in the day, the rules will be strictly enforced. He is a strict constructionist when it comes to the application of the rules of debate.

So far as I am concerned about the bill, I am willing to stop the whole discussion now if the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] will agree upon a date previous to the regular session of the next Congress. I hope to be able to develop as I proceed the obvious fact that the commission is being hamstrung in its efforts to do its best for the country and the radio business.

The reason why I am against the bill in its present form is because it seeks to continue these restrictions upon the commission which prevent it from doing a fine job in dealing with the radio problem. What I am seeking to do is to help develop the great radio industry and to aid in putting into every home in America receivers which may take messages of cheer and of music and of instruction in order that the industry may progress. The bill proposed by the Senator from Indiana seeks to continue to restrict the commission and to prevent it from being perfected against the invasion which are sure to be felt by the radio industry unless the commission is permitted to exercise its whole power as a judicial body to deal with these questions.

In this connection I want to quote a few words from a statement of Mr. Caldwell, the attorney for the commission, wherein he speaks upon the legal problems which are now presented. On the question of legal problems involved in the administration of the laws concerned with radio operation, Mr. Louis G. Caldwell, in a recent address before the American Bar Association, discussed these matters at length. He said:

All the disputes that necessarily arise in such a situation are reflected in hearings before the commission which have taken place almost daily for many months. On many, many questions the commission, the commission's lawyers, and lawyers representing the stations are feeling their way cautiously, trying to find helpful analogies from the rules of law that govern other kinds of business and human relations, and to work out principles that will insure an enduring foundation for the developments that are sure to come in the future. It is in these hearings that rules are being laid down and precedents established which will form an important part of radio law, independently of any statutes enacted by Congress.

The commission's decisions are in turn subject to review by the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia. Any applicant whose application is denied by the commission may appeal to that court. There are now 11 appeals pending before that court, only 1 of which has been decided. That court faces a tremendously difficult and important duty, and a great deal depends on what foundations it builds.

RIGHT TO REGULATE

Then, in addition, there are several cases pending in the courts in which the power of the United States Government to regulate radio at all is being challenged. To understand these cases you should be familiar with what took place during the years just prior to the enactment of the radio act of 1927. No doubt you remember what is usually called the period of chaos, or the breakdown of the law, between July, 1926, and February, 1927, when nearly 200 new broadcasting stations sprang into being, although with the 550 then in existence there were already too many. You will also remember that many of the existing stations increased their power, and jumped onto other wave lengths, including those which were reserved exclusively for Canada. Radio reception was ruined.

INCREASE IN OPERATIONS

This state of affairs followed certain court decisions and an opinion by the Attorney General of the United States on July 8, 1926. The decisions and the opinion were to the effect that under the former law regulating radio the Secretary of Commerce had no right to refuse a license to anyone who applied for one, and furthermore that he had no right to prescribe what wave length, power, or hours a station might use. So the Secretary of Commerce, who until that time had very ably administered radio, had to give it up, and for several months his authority was limited to acting as a sort of a bookkeeper in which all radio stations registered what they wanted.

Consequently, there were 732 broadcasting stations in existence when the commission was established, of which there were about 700 left last spring. The cases now in court grew out of its attempt last summer to reduce this number, and to reduce the power or hours of others so as to cause less interference. Two stations with power of 500 watts were reduced by the commission to 100 watts and promptly brought suit to restrain the United States attorney at Chicago from enforcing either the radio act of 1927 or the commission's order. Another station, with 5,000 watts, was closed down entirely and threatened to go on the air without a license. The Government brought suit against it to restrain it from doing so. These cases all involve the question as to whether Congress has any power at all to regulate radio, and many incidental questions.

One of the legal questions which you probably hear the most frequently is, Who owns the ether?

Then he goes on to speak about various international treaties and the impossibility of restraining the waves and limiting them to one country. The waves of radio are like disease. They do not respect irrevocable boundaries or international law. They go where they will. We are dealing with one of the great powers of nature, one not yet thoroughly understood.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STECK in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield with the understanding that I do not lose my position.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President——

Mr. FRAZIER. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD——

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, the former occupant of the chair ruled that if there were any interruptions, the Senator from New York would lose his place. I insist upon the enforcement of the rule.

Mr. COPELAND. I am very sorry, I may say to the Senator from North Dakota. I should be very happy to yield to him, but we have so many in opposition to that procedure that I suppose I must decline to yield. I am sorry, and I say that in advance and I shall say so in each instance if I am interrupted.

The statement of Mr. Caldwell, the able attorney for the commission, shows conclusively how very important it is that the rights of our country shall be thoroughly guarded in order that we may not find ourselves in the future in that embarrassing position where we have no control over the ether and where it is demonstrated that we have not the power to regulate and control the activities of the radio industry.

It must be apparent to you, Mr. President, that the legal side of the question, the settlement of controversies, the many large problems involved in the protection of the country, are quite sufficient to demand all the time and attention of this body. I am amazed to think that any patriotic citizen loving his country, interested in its development in every one of the scientific lines, and in the arts and in all things that contribute to the happiness, prosperity, and progress of our Nation, should advocate the enactment of a law which hampers and restrains the protection of our rights.

Let us look at the bill which is proposed to be enacted into law. What is its purpose? What does it do? It seeks to void the action of Congress two years ago in establishing a way of dealing with these great problems and by practically eliminating the effective action of the board to ruin the whole great industry. The Senator from Indiana was not satisfied with the bill he presented. It did not go far enough in assassinating the enterprise.

So he substitutes the House bill, which has in it all the evil suggestions of the Senate bill, and, besides that, has section 4, which I quote in part, as follows:

> The term of office of each member of the commission shall expire on February 23, 1930.

If we listen at all to what Mr. Caldwell, the attorney, said about the legal complications and the necessities of the enterprise, we realize that they can not be settled by February 23, 1930, less than one year from this date. That is all wrong. The Radio Commission should be permitted to do what it was established to do. Provision was made by law that there should be five commissioners appointed, in the first place, one for two, one for three, one for four, one for five, and one for six years, and then reappointments should be made. In other words, that there should be all the time five commissioners, not until February 23, 1930, but at least until 1935, and so far as the law is concerned, the commission would continue to operate so long as there was any need for its services.

The chairman of the committee, the distinguished, able, and astute Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], not satisfied with the way he hamstrung the commission in the bill he presented, now says to them, "If you are good you may work 11 months and 20 days." These commissioners should understand that their tenure of office is for the term of the appointment and be permitted through their respective terms to accomplish the purpose for which they were appointed. However, the Senator will, of course, succeed in passing this bill. He has served notice now that we are to stay here all to-day and all to-night. I suppose that means all day to-morrow; and he might even be willing to break the Sabbath for the sake of having this bill passed, which will take the heart out of the commission and make impossible the protection of the country. That is all right; I am going to do my part, and stand off that evil time for a few hours anyway. Then I shall know at the day of judgment that I did my share to prevent the country from being raped, as it will be if this bill shall be passed.

This matter was very thoroughly considered by the House committee and the Senate committee in extensive hearings which were held in 1926 and 1927, and of all the testimony which was given there was no testimony more enlightening than that given by the distinguished gentleman who at 12 o'clock on Monday next will become President of the United States. I may say to my distinguished friend from Indiana that I believe I was mistaken about the propriety of making Mr. Hoover President. If he is as sane and sensible about everything else as he is about radio, he will make the greatest President that the country ever had.

Mr. Herbert Hoover, then Secretary of Commerce of the United States, on Wednesday, the 6th day of January, 1926, in a hearing before the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the House of Representatives made first a formal statement, which he read into the record. It was afterwards discussed by the committee and by Mr. Hoover. On page 11 of the hearings on House bill 5589, January 6, we find this statement. I trust I shall not find it necessary to read all of it into the RECORD. I suppose, however, it may be necessary to do it if the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] shall ultimately preside. He was once in the chair when I was trying to defeat another bill five or six years ago, and he aided valiantly in defeating my patriotic purposes at that period, as I suppose he will succeed in doing this time. I congratulate him upon what he did then, and I congratulate him in anticipation of what he may later do on this date. But, in any event, I shall not at this time read all of Mr. Hoover's testimony, although all of it is interesting, instructive, enlightening, illuminating, and valuable. He divides his statement into various sections, and I find in section 5 he says:

> 5. The bill vests in the Secretary of Commerce the power to grant or refuse licenses, but his power is so limited as to obviate the possibility of its arbitrary exercise. The Secretary is required to make his determination with the public benefit as the test and standard. There is a complete check upon either arbitrary, unjust, or erroneous action by an appeal to the court by which a controversial question is determined independently and de novo. I have always taken the position that authority to control the granting of radio privileges is too great a power to be placed in the hands of any one administrative officer, and I am glad to see the checks and reviews which are imposed upon that power by this bill.

That is the end of the fifth recommendation of Mr. Hoover. See how wise that is. I do not know why I should stand here on the Democratic side of the aisle to praise the man who will become President of the United States on next Monday. If this debate were occurring on next Tuesday, of course he would be my President then, and it would be my duty to be for my President—right or wrong, my President. Yet I must confess that my study of the statement made by Mr. Hoover in this hearing has given me greater respect for him than I ever had before.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], who is a strict constructionist, who insists that the rules shall always be carried out to the letter, no matter what the spirit may be, thinks that it is irregular for me to yield for any purpose. If I may be assured, however, by the Presiding Officer that my position on the floor will not be endangered by reason of yielding, of course I will be glad to yield, but I want to be assured that it is all right to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair will say that he will recognize the Senator from New York at the conclusion of the business which the Senator from South Dakota desires to present.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Chair.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I insist upon the maintenance of the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from New York has yielded to the Senator from South Dakota on the condition stated by the present occupant of the chair.

Mr. COPELAND. He does not need to consult my opponent on this bill just to get permission to have his bill considered; does he? Does the Senator wish to proceed?

Mr. McMASTER. Did the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. The Chair assured me that it would be all right.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, as in executive session, that the presidential nomination of a certain judge in South Dakota be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. Hoover, in this statement——

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I should like to ask——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. WATSON. No; I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry, if the Senator will permit that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WATSON. Is the Senator from New York now on his second speech?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He is on his second speech——

Mr. COPELAND. No, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the amendment.

Mr. COPELAND. My second speech?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the amendment.

Mr. COPELAND. When, if I may inquire, did I lose my position as making the first one?

Mr. WATSON. When the Senator yielded just now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York yielded on the statement of the Chair that he would recognize the Senator from New York on the conclusion of the business which was to be conducted at the request of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, it makes very little difference to me at this stage of the proceedings; but I want to say that I distinctly understood that if I yielded for this purpose I would be recognized in my original right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not so understand.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. COPELAND. If I yield for any comment from the Senator from South Dakota do I then lose the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator does not?

Mr. McMASTER. I merely wish to say, Mr. President, that when I asked the Senator to yield for the purpose of sending a presidential nomination to the Judiciary Committee, I distinctly understood that the Senator from New York would not in any wise lose any of his rights.

Mr. COPELAND. So did the Senator from New York understand.

Mr. McMASTER. Otherwise, I never would have made the request, because I felt that it was an important matter, and that under the circumstances the Senator's rights should not be prejudiced because of his yielding at that time. That was my understanding.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, under the circumstances, in view of the fact that neither the Senator from New York nor the Senator from South Dakota, who requested the action, so understood, I ask unanimous consent that this be not counted against the Senator from New York.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I have no objection to that, but——

Mr. COPELAND. Just a moment. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Utah. The Senator is a friend of mine, and is always kind; but I claim the floor in my own right, and without any unanimous-consent arrangement or any concession on the part of anybody. I yielded the floor with the distinct understanding from the Chair that when this matter was disposed of I would have the floor in my own right and in my original right; and I claim it in that way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not so understand it. The Chair stated, in response to the question of the Senator from New York, that upon the completion of the business presented by the Senator from South Dakota the Senator from New York would be recognized, understanding that the Senator from New York, from the statement he had just made, understood that the rules were to be strictly enforced, not by the disposition of the present occupant of the Chair, but by the insistence of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from New York that I had no intention whatever of making a request that he was not in favor of, or that he would not receive with good grace. I had no intention whatever of casting any reflection on the position the Senator had taken. If the Senator objects to my request, I shall ask permission to withdraw it.

Mr. COPELAND. I do not want the Senator to think that I take second place in graciousness, but I do feel that there is a principle at issue here. In all good faith, relying upon what I was told by the Presiding Officer, I yielded to the Senator from South Dakota, expecting to resume my original right to the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. Under the rules, of course, the Senator did lose the floor; but that is the reason why I asked unanimous consent that he should not do so. Now, so far as I am concerned, if the Senator wants me to, I will withdraw that request.

Mr. COPELAND. No; I could not be so ungracious as that. I am very much obliged to the Senator, and I shall accept his request in the spirit in which he made it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not understand that the right of the Senator from New York was being prejudiced, because he has the right to speak twice on the bill, and twice on each amendment.

Mr. COPELAND. Then, as I understand the matter, Mr. President, I am now speaking in my original right, and the first time, on the bill, by reason of the unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unless there is objection, and the Chair hears none.

Mr. COPELAND. Now, then——

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. FESS. I desire to correct a statement of the Chair.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will I lose the floor if I permit the Senator from Ohio to orate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will not.

Mr. COPELAND. I want to know now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has stated that the Senator from New York will not lose the floor.

Mr. FESS. When a unanimous-consent request is made I have a right to reserve the right to object until I have made a statement. That does not take the Senator off the floor. I wanted to make this statement:

The Chair assumed from what the Senator from New York had stated that I demanded the rigid enforcement of the rules. I had stated that I would not demand that, and I should like to have that statement corrected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair was attempting to repeat the words of the Senator from New York and was not quoting the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. It may be that rigid enforcement of the rules will be necessary.

Mr. COPELAND. I accept all the apologies.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, may I make a statement?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. COPELAND. Just a moment, Mr. President. I do not think I can yield.

Mr. WATSON. I am reserving the right to object to the unanimous-consent request made by the Senator from Utah for the purpose of making a statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unanimous-consent request has already been agreed to.

Mr. WATSON. Then I can not make the statement under that pretext.

Mr. COPELAND. The far-seeing Senator from Indiana will find a pretext, so that he will be able to make it.

I am sorry that I have to announce to my colleagues, limited in number but filled with enthusiasm, that I must refuse to yield from now on. I am the monarch of all I survey; my right there is none to dispute, provided I do not yield to some one.

In this statement of Mr. Herbert Hoover, he speaks——

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. COUZENS. Under the rules, is the Senator who is occupying the floor required to remain at his seat?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that there is such a rule. The Chair does not remember its ever having been enforced during the short time he has been in the Senate.

Mr. COUZENS. In view of the fact that we are enforcing the rules at this time, I request that the Chair enforce the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood that that was a mere statement that the rules would be enforced, not by the present occupant of the chair.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, am I in due form?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York will proceed.

Mr. COPELAND. I thought I was imposed upon by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] four or five years ago when he called me to account for not rising to address the Chair. I had leaned upon the arm of the chair behind me. When I protested against the cruelty of his action, when I had always looked upon him as a Methodist brother and found him instead to be a rigid Presbyterian, he told me—and that is the reason why I know so well what the rule is—that if he called me strictly to account I could not perambulate about the Chamber. So that is the rule; but the Senator from Ohio said he would not be so cruel as to impose quiet upon one who likes to take exercise as I do. Now, here comes the Senator from Michigan, insisting upon the rules, helping the Senator from Indiana to pass this nefarious measure by demanding strict construction.

Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator from Michigan is not in his seat. I demand that he take it. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He is not addressing the Chair.

Mr. COPELAND. Has he a right to be in the seat of another Senator? He addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator entitled to that seat did not demand it.

Mr. COPELAND. He addressed the Chair from the seat of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. He violated the rules of the Senate. I shall not insist, however, upon a ruling.

If the time comes when we observe the rules of the Senate there will be order in the Chamber on all occasions, and the Senate will proceed in an orderly and decent way to transact its business.

I am a loose constructionist; but I give you my word that for the rest of this afternoon, so far as I know them, the rules of debate are going to be strictly enforced.

Now, being in my own place, and having risen to address the Chair, I will proceed with the statement of Mr. Herbert Hoover; and I hope that there are those on the other side of the aisle who are not particularly respectful to me at times who at least will be respectful to their successful candidate for President.

There are lots of things that we can say to-day that we can not say after noon on Monday, and the mention of the name of Mr. Hoover is a reminder to me. There is in my State an outstanding citizen, a distinguished lawyer, a brave soldier, a man who has served his country, Mr. Donovan; and now we learn that he can not be appointed to the office of Attorney General because he is a Catholic or a "wet," I am not sure which. It is an outrageous thing that this man should be deprived of the privilege of serving his country, and serving it well, because he does not happen to conform to the standard fixed by those who dominate the next President.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. COPELAND. I can not yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York refuses to yield.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. Hoover, in his statement on the 6th of January, 1926, defined very clearly the distinction which should be made in regard to the arbitrary action of any body, commission, secretary, or what not. He defined the necessity of having an appeal from that body. Now, listen to me, Senators. The very group of men who establish the standards and attempt to adjust differences and sometimes fail, acting as an administrative body, acts as a court of appeals on its own decisions. Could anything be more absurd?

When we passed the law in 1927, we recognized that; we recognized that it would be an absurdity and an anomaly for an appellate court to deal with questions which the same group of men had dealt with as an administrative board. Yet Senators who favor this bill are proposing to continue that absurdity.

Mr. Hoover does not take that view. He recognized the necessity of having a different body deal with those questions. He said:

> There should be a complete check upon arbitrary, unjust, or erroneous action.

Yet here we are proposing by the enactment of this legislation to have the same men, as an appellate court, decide whether or not the action taken by them as administrators was "arbitrary, unjust, or erroneous." One has but to recite that fact to show how outrageous the proposal is.

In the further statement of Mr. Hoover to the House committee, as found on page 11 of the hearings before the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the House, Sixty-ninth Congress, on House bill 558, I find this. I quote Mr. Hoover:

> Sixth, the bill provides for a national commission of nine members to which may be referred any questions upon which the Secretary of Commerce desires their judgment.

As we ultimately passed the law, instead of the commission having nine members it has five members; but, of course, the same principle applies.

> There are many purely administrative questions in the detail of administrative regulation, such, for instance, as the assignment of a particular wave length to a given station, which may properly be left to the judgment of a single official.

This man speaks almost as if he were inspired. Of course, I never could have split my ticket, but I declare, if I had known this before election, it would have made the campaign harder in some respects.

> There are many purely administrative questions in the detail of administrative regulations, such, for instance, as the assignment of a particular wave length to a given station, which may properly be left to the judgment of a single official.

That is exactly what I am contending for, that the details of administrative regulations should be left to the men in the Department of Commerce, where they were then, where they are now. As I shall show at a later time, while there are some employees in the commission, in general the work is done in the Department of Commerce even at this moment. I will give the facts about that.

I am about to quote now, may I say, from page 145 of the hearings before the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate on Senate bill 4937, to continue the Federal Radio Commission. This is the testimony of Commissioner Caldwell. I will ask Senators not to be confused in their minds between Commissioner Caldwell and Attorney Caldwell. Commissioner Caldwell is the gentleman of whom I spoke, who has been interested in radio so many years, who is a radio engineer, and whom I designated and truly believe to be the greatest authority on radio in the world. He was the member of the commission at the hearing. I quote the language of Commissioner Caldwell:

> I think all of you gentlemen, Members of Congress, will recall that radio was handled best and the complaints were fewest when radio was under the supervision of the Department of Commerce, under Secretary Hoover.
> Some questions have been asked as to just what the radio division of the Department of Commerce is. That radio division at present consists of 135 people, in comparison with the Radio Commission's present staff of 82 people. The staff of the radio division of the Department of Commerce includes 65 trained radio men who are competent radio experts scattered over the country. The Radio Commission at this time has only four trained radio men outside of the two officers who have been loaned it by the Army and Navy. The ratio there is 65 to 4 trained radio men, the rest of the employees in both organizations being largely clerical.

Yet there are those who are clamoring that the administrative features of the radio business should be left with the Radio Commission, when as a matter of fact in the commission there are 4 trained technical men while in the Department of Commerce there are 65. I am not talking about ancient history; I am talking about the condition which prevails now, on the 1st day of March, 1929. The technical work is being done, as it should be, in the Department of Commerce, and that is where the work will be done if we defeat this bill. That is where the work has been done; that is where the work will be done, no matter whether we pass the bill or defeat the bill. The administrative work will be done in the Department of Commerce.

We are hampering this commission by requiring the commission to sit around in these various hearings conducted by these experts, these technical men, cluttering up the records of the commission with hearings over matters which are trivial or technical, and where there is no more need of the physical presence of the commissioners than there is need of the presence there of the President of the United States.

I know that there will be dozens of Senators who will vote for this bill who truly believe that I am advocating the destruction of the commission and its abolition. Every day some Senator has said to me, "Why do you want to abolish the commission?" I do not want to abolish the commission. I want to take away from the commission the necessity of dealing with these trivial things, in order that the commission may devote itself to the larger things which have to do with the development of the industry and the maintenance of the rights of the country in it. That is exactly the situation.

Mr. Hoover saw that. He said:

> There are many purely administrative questions in the detail of administrative regulation, such, for instance, as the assignment of a particular wave length to a given station, which may properly be left to the judgment of a single official.

That is what will happen if this bill is modified to take out that outrageous amendment which proposes to terminate the terms of the commissioners on the 23d of next February, and permit this body to do the great work which it was established to do.

Now I wish to quote again from Mr. Hoover:

> But there are other broader and more important matters, such, for instance, as the determination of the persons who are to exercise radio privileges under the rule of public interest, which involve a large element of discretion and in which it is wise to have the consensus of several minds.

He speaks as one inspired. I quote further:

> Such decisions, especially where the questions become controversial, should properly be made by a board rather than an individual. To draw a legislative line between these two classes of functions is no doubt difficult; but it seems to me the line lies at the point of controversy as to the radio privileges.

The judgment of the board is made final and binding, subject only to an appeal to the courts, and I consider this a highly important provision.

He says we should draw a legislative line between these two classes of functions; that is, the administrative on the one hand and the judicial on the other; that we should draw a line between those two classes, and the line lies at the point of controversy as to the radio privileges.

That was written into the law, and very wisely so. I want Senators to see that the committee, acting upon the wise suggestion of Mr. Hoover, did write this into the law. I hold in my hands a copy of the radio law, Public Law No. 632, Sixty-ninth Congress, H. R. 9971. This is an act for the regulation of radio communications and for other purposes. It is the original and the present radio law.

It states:

Any person—

Mr. President, I am now a strict constructionist, and order should prevail. I had a teacher once who said that "Order is Heaven's first law."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I take it from that remark that the Presiding Officer wants the Senate to be as near heavenly as possible. [Laughter.]

Mr. COPELAND. As near as possible is right, with emphasis on the "possible."

Mr. Hoover said:

That any question of dispute as to who shall enjoy the radio privilege may be referred to that body not through the volition of the Secretary of Commerce but by either applicant or disputant in the question.

Now see what was put in the law: This man spoke as one inspired, and I am amazed that the Congress of the United States adopted so thoroughly all the wise suggestions he made. I am making some wise suggestions to-day which will not be adopted. However, I shall make them anyway. The law provides:

Any person, company, or corporation, or any State or political subdivision thereof, aggrieved or whose interests are adversely affected by any decision, determination, or regulation of the Secretary of Commerce, may appeal therefrom to the commission by filing with the Secretary of Commerce notice of such appeal within 30 days after such decision or determination or promulgation of such regulation. All papers and other records pertaining to such application on file with the Secretary will thereupon be transferred by him to the commission. The commission shall hear such appeals de novo under such rules and regulations as it may determine.

"Shall hear such appeals de novo," as if they were entirely new. Does that happen? Mr. President, you know it does not. What happens now is that in the Department of Commerce the radio commissioners have to sit in to listen to all of these discussions and then, having rendered a decision, do the absurdly impossible thing of hearing de novo an appeal. I should think that anybody who has any desire in the world to protect the interests of this country would see how ridiculous it is to ask the commission to deal de novo with a problem which it has already settled by its administrative acts.

Mr. Hoover went on to say:

The judgment of the board is made final and binding subject only to an appeal to the court.

That is what the law provides. I quote further:

Decisions by the commission as to matters so appealed and as to all other matters over which it has jurisdiction shall be finally subject to the right of appeal herein given.

So Mr. Hoover recommended that we should draw a line between what he called these two classes of functions, the administrative on the one side and the judicial on the other, and that that decision when made by the board acting de novo, taking the matter all over again, acting as if it were a new question, and then that the judgment should be made final and binding subject only to appeal to the court, as Mr. Hoover said. Then I quote further from him:

As some of the members of the committee know, I have felt that the provision for a board of reference should be somewhat tightened up over the present construction of the bill.

Mr. President, there is "confusion in the temple."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York requests that the Senate be in order.

Mr. COPELAND. I quote further:

In other words, that any question of dispute as to who shall enjoy the radio privilege may be referred to that body, not through the volition of the Secretary of Commerce, but by either applicant or disputant in the question. Those who have followed the details of radio regulation will recognize that a very large part of the disputes and frictions in the radio world are settled by amiable arbitration of the department and that our officials are able to wipe away 90 per cent of the disputes which occur; but it seems to me there must be some point at which no arbitrary action can be taken. The privilege of broadcasting will be of enhancing importance and, so long as the art fails to develop sufficient channels so that all comers may broadcast, that privilege will accrue more and more of public importance. And it is for that reason that I emphasize the necessity of some independent body being able to settle public disputes as to the radio privilege.

And yet almost without exception the ardent and enthusiastic followers of Herbert Hoover on the other side of the aisle intimate that Mr. Hoover is all wrong, that he does not know anything about the radio business, and we have a right to conclude, therefore, that he does not know about any kind of governmental business. Of course that is absurd. This is a man who has made an intimate study of radio and probably knows more about it than anybody in the country except Commissioner Caldwell and "whose wise guidance in the formative stages of radio communication contributed so greatly to the development of this new service to the American people." I quote those few words from the dedication to Herbert Hoover of a remarkable book by Stephen Davis on The Law of Radio Communication, a book which should be read by everybody who really wants to know something about radio and who does not depend for his information upon what he is told in a few words by the chairman of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce.

As I said a little while ago——

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. COPELAND. For what purpose, may I ask?

Mr. HEFLIN. To suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. COPELAND. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Edwards	King	Simmons
Barkley	Fess	McKellar	Smith
Bayard	Fletcher	McMaster	Smoot
Bingham	Frazier	McNary	Steck
Black	George	Mayfield	Steiwer
Blaine	Gerry	Metcalf	Stephens
Blease	Glass	Moses	Swanson
Borah	Glenn	Neely	Thomas, Idaho
Bratton	Goff	Norbeck	Thomas, Okla.
Brookhart	Gould	Norris	Trammell
Broussard	Greene	Nye	Tydings
Bruce	Hale	Oddie	Tyson
Burton	Harris	Pine	Vandenberg
Capper	Harrison	Ransdell	Wagner
Caraway	Hastings	Reed, Mo.	Walsh, Mass.
Copeland	Hawes	Reed, Pa.	Walsh, Mont.
Couzens	Hayden	Robinson, Ark.	Warren
Curtis	Heflin	Robinson, Ind.	Waterman
Dale	Johnson	Sackett	Watson
Deneen	Jones	Schall	Wheeler
Dill	Kendrick	Sheppard
Edge	Keyes	Shortridge

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I hope we may have order in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, Mr. DAVIS, of the House committee, asked a question, which will be found on page 13 of the hearings before the Marine and Fisheries Committee of January 6, 1927.

Mr. President, we are under a strict construction of the rules to-day. I hope the Chair will preserve order in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York requests that the Senate be in order.

Mr. COPELAND. I think, under the rules, if I am rightly advised, Senators have to sit down, do they not, except when addressing the Chair?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Or when entering or leaving the Chamber.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I can not yield to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is that a suggestion of the Senator from New York, or does he make a point of order?

Mr. COPELAND. I have no suggestion to make. I will trust to the good judgment of the Presiding Officer.

I shall now read from the hearings. Mr. DAVIS asked this question:

I should like to get Mr. Hoover's opinion on a matter of policy while he is before us. Mr. Secretary, you referred to the fact that in accordance with your views as well as the views of others on the committee, and Mr. WHITE, particularly, in the preparation of this bill, it has been undertaken to meet the situation as expressed by you just now, and which you have several times previously expressed, that you did not think sole and final authority ought to be vested in the Secretary of Commerce or in any other one man. As I say, they have undertaken to meet that situation in two particulars; one by granting an appeal to the courts in certain instances, and the other by that reference board.

You have just expressed the idea that the bill ought to be tightened up, and I presume you mean made more comprehensive, in a way, with respect to the reference board. Now, have you given any consideration to the idea of creating a permanent commission which might have jurisdiction over not only radio matters but also of the telephone and telegraph, which the Interstate Commerce Commission now has nominal jurisdiction of for the determination of what might be termed quasi judicial powers and certain matters of regulation, and then to grant an appeal to this commission where an appeal is granted from the administrative officer which, under the provisions of this bill, is the Secretary of Commerce, instead of an appeal to the courts?

Then Mr. Hoover replied—and I quote his reply:

Mr. DAVIS, I have not given the matter as much thought as I should like to.

What I am quoting from Mr. Hoover is of interest to several members of the Interstate Commerce Committee who have in mind the establishment of a communications department, to have a body like the Interstate Commerce Commission, in a sense, a body to have supervision not alone of radio communication but of telegraph and telephone communication, all forms of communication through the air or by wire.

We might just as well talk about cutting a slice of cheese out of the moon as to think that by prolonging the life of this board for one year, only at the end of that time the Congress would pass an act establishing a communications department. I have no doubt that the time may come when such a department will be instituted, but the members of the committee who are seeking to hamstring the Radio Commission for a period of one year from the 23d of last month, in order to have this matter go over to the 23d of February, 1930, are enthusiastic and hopeful, indeed, if they think that between the time we convene on the first Monday in December of 1929 and the 23d of February, 1930, two months, we are going to enact legislation to establish a communications department. Yet, when I talk to certain Members of the Senate in private, they tell me the reason they want to postpone this for one year is in order that there may be established a communications department of the Government. It is ridiculous, absurd, to think that it could be done, no matter how meritorious the project is. I am not sure but it is a good plan. However, the first question that would be raised by the thousands of stockholders of the Western Union and the Postal Telegraph companies would be: "If you have so much faith in the idea of a communications department for all lines of communication through the air, why have you not tried it for the radio?"

I am sorry, Mr. President, that I do not see in the Chamber among the 16 Senators who are present and attending to their duties one particular Senator. Pretty soon I am going to make a list of the absentees. There is not anything a Senator, when he runs for office, hates so much as the charge that he is inattentive to his duties. I do not know that I will give the names; yet I am not sure but that I shall. Already I see a distinguished Member of the Senate proceeding to his seat, and that is a good idea. I hope they will all do so.

My attention has been called to the fact that among the 16 I counted 2 or 3 are Members of the House, so I presume there are not over 12 Members of the Senate present, although it is now 25 minutes after 4 o'clock in the afternoon, the very time of day when every Senator should be in his seat, giving attention to the business of the United States. Anyway, of the Senators I have in mind who have been talking to me about a communications department of government, not one is here because they are so certain——

Mr. WHEELER. That this bill is going to pass?

Mr. COPELAND. That they will put up a lightning rod and have some sort of communication which would afford the final judgment on what is right about this measure, even though I venture to say not more than 16 of them have ever read it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Will the Senator forgive me for not giving him my attention while I go to the desk for a moment? [Laughter.]

Mr. COPELAND. If there is one man in the United States Senate who is always attending to his duty, who never fails to study every bill and its significance to the people of his State and of the country, it is the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]. As he apologized just now as he passed me, he said he was simply going to the desk to get a paper and when he gets that he will return to his seat. I know he will do so, because he seeks always to widen his knowledge and to be informed on a subject which has to do with the welfare of the Nation.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the Senator tell us what he is trying to inform the Senate on now?

Mr. COPELAND. I can not yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. Perhaps the Senator from Montana wants a compliment paid to him.

Mr. COPELAND. I can not yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TYSON in the chair). The Senator from New York declines to yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me in order that I may put something in the RECORD?

Mr. COPELAND. I can not yield. I will not give the name of the Senator who has just passed me, because I do not want the RECORD to show that he has been out of the Chamber until now; but I must say to the Senator that we are operating under a strict construction of the rules. The hard-hearted senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] has outlined the necessity for a strict observance under certain conditions. I must not be too hard upon him, because he was willing to allow some elasticity, but he will not permit me to yield. I want to yield; I would love to yield to the Senator from Connecticut. He is a handsome man; he is a fine, lovable character, but I can not yield. I am sorry. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, the other night when we discussed this matter the question of a department of communication was raised. I think that is worthy of study. The way to find out whether or not it is practical and sensible and workable is to give the Radio Commission the power which it deserves by reason of past achievements. I want to say that it has been a good commission. I have no criticism to pass on its major acts.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BINGHAM. Is it in accordance with the ruling of the Chair that for a Senator to yield for a question is yielding the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has a right to yield for a question only.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. BLEASE. Is it legal to transact business without a quorum of the Senate being physically present?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the record, there is a quorum present.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut addressed a parliamentary inquiry to the Chair, and I wish he would listen to what I say. I am extremely sorry about the attitude of the Chair with reference to this matter. I should like to yield; and if the Senator can discover some means by which I can yield I will gladly yield to him, in order that the matter of importance which I have no doubt he has in mind may be given the attention it deserves.

Mr. BINGHAM. I had a question in mind, but I was afraid to ask it for fear it might cause the Senator to lose the floor.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, about this matter of a communications department, as it is at this moment the Interstate Commerce Commission has jurisdiction over the telephone and telegraph systems of the country.

(At this point a message was received from the House of Representatives, which appears before Mr. COPELAND's speech.)

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, may the clerk state, for the information of the Senate, the bills that have been transmitted from the House?

Mr. KING. The Senator from Massachusetts does not ask for any action upon them?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Oh, no.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the message refers to two House bills.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. What are the names of the bills?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They are House bills which require no further action on the part of the Senate. The Senator from New York will proceed.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, did not the House clerk say that conferees were asked for on one of those bills? I understood him to say that the House asked for conferees on one of them.

Mr. JONES. The Clerk announced that the House had agreed to the conference asked by the Senate.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, the matter has not yet been laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the House has agreed to the request of the Senate for a conference.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, has the matter been laid before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that it does not have to be laid before the Senate.

Mr. BINGHAM. How can the Chair inform the Senate as to what the message contains unless it has been laid before the Senate?

Mr. BLEASE. We will make that point later, Mr. President.

Mr. KING. The Chair has prescience.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the announcement was made at the door of the Senate by a representative of the House.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I understood that the appointment of conferees on a bill was asked for. I am perfectly willing to yield for the purpose of making the appointment of the conferees. I do not wish to hold up any important business. If I can do that without yielding the floor, I am very happy to do it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate asked for a conference on its amendment numbered 39 to the Interior Department appropriation bill; and this is a message from the House announcing that it has agreed to the request for a conference, as stated to the Chair by the clerk.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, this seems to me a very extraordinary manner of laying before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives. I have never before known a case where it was necessary for the Presiding Officer to ask the clerk what was in the message. The usual method is to lay the message before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that that is the ruling the Chair will make, as recommended by the parliamentarian of the Senate.

Mr. BINGHAM. I appeal from the ruling of the Chair, Mr. President.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator object to the Chair laying down the message?

Mr. BINGHAM. I have no objection to that. I understood that the Chair was asked to lay down the message.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will lay down to the Senate whatever messages are required to be laid down under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. KING. I call for the regular order.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry: I understand that the Senate asked for another conference on amendment numbered 39 and the House has agreed to it. That ends it.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I appeal from the ruling of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut appeals from the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the Chair is perfectly right. Paragraph 7, of Rule VII, reads as follows——

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry: An appeal is pending from the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. ASHURST. And I desire to discuss that appeal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. ASHURST. I simply desire to read this rule, which shows that the Chair is perfectly correct. As soon as a message is received it is the duty of the Chair to lay it before the Senate, which the Chair did; and any Senator may at any time ask that it be laid before the Senate. I ask the clerk to read all of that rule—paragraph 7 of Rule VII, page 13 of the Rules.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rule is that—

> The Presiding Officer may at any time lay, and it shall be in order at any time for a Senator to move to lay, before the Senate, any bill or other matter sent to the Senate by the President or the House of Representatives, and any question pending at that time shall be suspended for this purpose. Any motion so made shall be determined without debate.

The Chair will rule that there is no further action to be taken upon the message sent from the House of Representatives until the conference report comes in.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, a further parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BINGHAM. Has the Chair laid the matter before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives transmitting certain resolutions, and granting a conference with the Senate on the Interior Department appropriation bill.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BLACK. I understood that the Senator from Connecticut appealed from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Chair has now laid before the Senate the message. The question which I asked the Chair was how it was possible for the Chair to tell the Senate what was in the message from the House through the medium of asking the clerk before the matter had been laid before the Senate; but the Chair now has performed his duty in accordance with the rule, and laid the matter before the Senate.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico will state the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BRATTON. As I understood, prior to that action, however, the Chair had made a ruling from which the Senator from Connecticut appealed, and unless he withdraws the appeal it is pending before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut desire to have his appeal submitted to the Senate?

Mr. BINGHAM. No, Mr. President; I withdraw the appeal.

Mr. COPELAND. Moreover, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair asks the Senate what action they will take upon the message from the House of Representatives?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I move that the bills be referred to the appropriate committees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. You have heard the motion.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON. What is the business before the Senate that the Chair is laying down?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The radio bill is before the Senate, and the Senator from New York has the floor.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, we know the rules very well when it comes to where a Senator shall stand on his feet; but we do not seem to know them very well when it comes to a matter of vital importance.

I want the Senate to listen to this fine report made by Mr. Caldwell, the commission's special counsel. Before doing so, I will return for just a moment to the communications department.

I observe that one or two Senators have returned to the Chamber. I have already said that from time to time I shall include in my remarks the names of the absentees, but I notice one or two here who were not here a little while ago.

Mr. President, there is one rule that I am going to insist on, and that is the rule of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. COPELAND. Nothing could be more ridiculous than the argument that we should continue this Radio Commission to the 23d of February of next year in order that we may arrange for a communications department. Before a communications department is arranged for, the Committee on Interstate Commerce in the Senate and the appropriate committee in the House will have hearings that will extend over years, if I am any prophet. If I were to defeat this bill on the theory that it is going to facilitate the establishment of a communications department I should not be very far-seeing, to say the least, and I should feel that I was utterly unpatriotic to do a thing which is going to hamstring the commission and defeat it in carrying on a work of vast importance to every home in America.

In the United States Daily of February 28 I find this address, and I shall read part of this report. It is found on the first page of the paper, and is headed:

> Development of laws on radio said to be proceeding slowly. Commission counsel declares lawyers are seeking analogies from other legal rules in working out principles to be applied in litigation.

I quote from the article:

> Radio, with its rapid growth, has opened a new legal field in which many disputes are arising and the Federal Radio Commission, its counsel, and lawyers of radio stations and associations appearing before the commission "are feeling their way cautiously, trying to find helpful analogies from the rules of law that govern other kinds of business and human relations and to work out principles that will insure an enduring foundation of the developments that are sure to come in the future," according to Louis G. Caldwell, the commission's special counsel.
> Mr. Caldwell's statements were made as chairman of the committee on radio law of the American Bar Association, which is sponsoring a weekly radio program on jurisprudence.

I hope that the Official Reporter will not get into the RECORD the conversations which are being held in such loud tones that they fill the Chamber. I hope he will distinguish between my own remarks and those of Senators at a distance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. COPELAND. I read:

"At these hearings, which have been held almost daily at the commission," said Mr. Caldwell, "the rules are being laid and precedents established which will form an important part of radio law, independently of any statutes enacted by Congress." "Proper laws," he said, "can do a great deal to encourage a useful art; unfortunately, improper laws can do a great deal to stifle it."

He speaks as a prophet, because, if this measure is enacted, it will be another improper law which will have a part in stifling this great art. I continue the quotation:

Popular belief that one of the most important legal questions of radio is "Who owns the ether?" was discounted by Mr. Caldwell. "As a practical matter it is probably the least important," he declared, stating that "until somebody finds out what the ether is, or whether it even exists, it is hardly worth while speculating as to who has title to it." The full text of Mr. Caldwell's speech follows:

It is altogether fitting, I think, that one of this series of talks which is being sponsored by the American Bar Association, should have to do with the law regulating the very means by which the talks are brought to you.

Senators will bear in mind that, as chairman of this committee of the Bar Association, he was speaking over the radio and giving to the world his views of the radio problem. So he said:

It is altogether fitting, I think, that one of this series of talks which is being sponsored by the American Bar Association should have to do with the law regulating the very means by which the talks are brought to you. The association took an early interest in the development of this branch of law. Up until this last year, however, the air and the ether were both in the province of the same committee, which handled the complicated problems that came with the airplane and the even more complicated problems that centered around radio.

This was the air-law committee, formerly headed by Mr. William MacCracken, now Assistant Secretary of Commerce in charge of aviation.

I am not advised how well informed the Members of the Senate are regarding the important work done by Secretary McCracken. I think that he has done more to establish the commercial air service than any other man in America. We owe a great debt to him for what he has done to put commercial aviation on the successful plane on which it is at present. Therefore, whenever I see his name mentioned in connection with any activity, I am pleased to know exactly what his views are regarding it. So Mr. Caldwell said:

This was the air-law committee, formerly headed by Mr. William McCracken, now Assistant Secretary of Commerce in charge of aviation.

He continued:

Last year the association decided that the combination of the air and the ether covered a little too much ground, so to speak, for any one committee. The result is that we now have a separate committee on radio law which began functioning last fall, and of which it is my privilege to be chairman.

That is an interesting thing, Mr. President, to think that within a few years the radio art has so developed that the great American Bar Association considers it essential to have a committee to give its attention to radio law, and it is very proper, too, that in making the appointments to this committee Mr. Caldwell, who has had such wide experience in connection with the Radio Commission, should be chosen chairman. Mr. Caldwell continues:

You will be interested in knowing the make-up of this committee. On the far east Boston is represented by Mr. Fred C. Fernald; New York by Mr. Robert T. Levaine; Chicago by Mr. Edward A. Zimmerman, and Seattle by Mr. Cassius E. Gates. As for myself, I have a family in California, an apartment in Chicago, and a job in Washington, all of whom and which I trust will be reunited soon in Chicago

I wish him well if he is going to Chicago. That is the community where every citizen lives within gunshot of his neighbor, and I hope that he will be safe when he gets to Chicago. However, it is a charming place, and I am always glad to go there, and to leave, if I leave, with my life. Continuing the quotation, Mr. Caldwell said, speaking to the radio audience:

Your interest in radio may be simply based on the occasional evening's pleasure it gives you, or it may mean a great deal more. Perhaps you rely upon it for information in your business or on your farm. Whatever your interest, you will certainly agree that it is too important a part of the daily life of the American people to permit its full and free development in the interest of the public in any way hindered. Proper laws can do a great deal to encourage a useful art; unfortunately, improper laws can do a great deal to stifle it.

This is the man who is the special counsel for the Radio Commission, who is so highly respected by the American bar that he was made chairman of this committee, made up of other distinguished members of the bar, and he laments the fact that the passage of improper laws may stifle the radio art. Pretty soon he is going to scold me for being one man in a movement. I read further:

It is the ambition of our committee to be of such assistance as we can by presenting to the association, and through the association to Congress, a picture of the problems as we understand them and suggestions for their solution. Naturally I do not wish to be understood as meaning that Congress in particular needs education on the subject.

He was very modest in that statement, Mr. President. If there is one place in the world where education on the subject is needed, it is in the Congress of the United States. It would not have been seemly, however, for Mr. Caldwell to say that, and I want the RECORD to show distinctly that I said it. Perhaps he merely thought it. Of course, there are 13 Senators present at this time—five minutes to 5 o'clock—who are receiving some education in radio. The others, I assume, are enjoying the sunshine, which I hope continues. We never have any here. We do not even have natural light in this Chamber, and fresh air is unknown. I suppose on that account it is wicked for me even to speak in the atmosphere and further contaminate it.

I will continue the statement made by Mr. Caldwell.

Mr. DALE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. COPELAND. I am sorry; I want to yield, but the Senator was not here when the rule of strict construction was placed upon us. I want to yield; I am just hungry to yield; but if I do, I will lose the floor; and therefore I must appear to be discourteous. I am sorry, because the Senator who has asked the question is one of the kind and considerate Senators, who always tries to be helpful to his associates. I am sure he will forgive me for my position.

Mr. DALE. I thank the Senator. I did not understand the ruling.

Mr. COPELAND. Nobody else does. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLACK. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. BLACK. Is it true that if a Senator yields for a question he loses the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will rule that he will not.

Mr. COPELAND. Does the Senator wish to ask me a question?

Mr. BLACK. I thought the Senator from Vermont did.

Mr. COPELAND. May I say to the Senator from Vermont that the Chair rules that if he desires to ask a question I will not lose the floor?

Mr. DALE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont.

Mr. DALE. As I came in I caught some remark from the Senator to the effect that we did not have any light in the Senate Chamber, and I really want to ask him if he does not think it would add to the beauty of the Senate Chamber as well as to the lighting capacity if we could have it finished in lining marble?

Mr. COPELAND. That is a very proper question, and an important one.

Mr. DALE. Mr. President——

Mr. COPELAND. I will answer the question.

Mr. DALE. The Senator from New York has not answered my question.

Mr. COPELAND. I am going to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. COPELAND. No; but if the Chair will inform the Senator from Vermont, I am going to answer his question in a moment.

Our genial and beloved Vice President—and to mention his name, I am sure, brings a responsive thrill in every heart. No man ever came to Washington and in so short a time endeared himself more to his official associates and the community than General Dawes. I am sure everyone will concede that. He is beloved of everybody. It will be recalled that he is very critical of filibustering. I am sure he would disapprove of this if he were convinced it were a filibuster, which of course it is not. But he said that when a Senator takes the floor for the purpose of filibustering, he talks on everything in the world except the subject before the Senate. He is right about that in general. I made up my mind that whatever I had to say to-day would relate to the question before us; but I think I may turn aside long enough to say to the Senator from Vermont that I think it would be a splendid thing when we refinish this Chamber as it should be done, if we had the lining marble from Vermont. I am sure it would add dignity and beauty to the Chamber.

But, to return to our mutton, in Mr. Caldwell's radio talk he said further:

There are individual Senators and Representatives who have made a very intensive study of radio and who may be trusted to do their best to safeguard the true interests of the listening public. There are, naturally enough, many others in both Houses who, in the multitude of important questions which come before them, must rely on studies made by others. The same is true of the membership of our association. The great majority of lawyers have not yet had occasion to come into contact with radio matters, and we regarded it as one of our duties to place before them such information as we can give them, so that they in turn may have in mind the essential problems when occasions arise for presentation of them to the courts of the land.

FIVE RADIO BILLS PENDING IN CONGRESS

Just to give you an idea of the problems Congress is facing, let me give you a list of the bills that are now pending before it. So far as I know there are five different bills all told. The principal one has to do with the Federal Radio Commission itself and proposes to extend its present powers for another year. Under the radio act of 1927 the commission was established and was given direct jurisdiction over radio communication for a period of one year.

When I say direct jurisdiction, I mean that it decided who should or should not have licenses; it had the power to adopt regulations which stations must observe in order to keep these licenses, and it held all the hearings on controversies. The Department of Commerce, which was the licensing authority before that statute was passed, still retained some power. For example, it still assigned call letters and had control over the inspection of stations, the licensing of station operators, and the reporting of violations of the law or the commission's regulations.

I want to show you something about that. Mr. Caldwell, speaking now of Commissioner Caldwell, called attention to the very large work which is being done in the Department of Commerce. I stated, for instance, that there are 65 trained radio men in the Department of Commerce and only 4 on the Radio Commission. The question was asked by the distinguished chairman of the committee:

What do these trained radio men do in the radio division of the Department of Commerce?

Mr. CALDWELL. In the radio division of the Department of Commerce, under the Secretary of Commerce, these men supervise the operation of all the radio stations of the country, including the ships, the land stations, the broadcasting stations, and 16,000 amateurs.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you mean to say the commission has no authority or jurisdiction over them?

Mr. CALDWELL. The commission has no authority or jurisdiction over the commerce radio division staff except they cooperate together very successfully.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to his colleague?

Mr. COPELAND. For what purpose?

Mr. WAGNER. I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. COPELAND. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I make the point of order that there has been no business transacted since the last quorum call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will rule that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I am surprised that the Senator should make that point of order. I understood that business had been transacted when the Chair had laid before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Connecticut is speaking on a parliamentary question and is entirely right. We have had business transacted by the Senate. I have no particular desire to press the matter, but since a message came from the House and was laid before the Senate, business has been transacted and my colleague was perfectly in order in his suggestion of the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from New York that no action was taken upon the message from the House of Representatives; therefore no business has been transacted.

Mr. COPELAND. I do not desire to press the matter so far as I am concerned.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BINGHAM. Is it not the case that when the Chair laid the message from the House of Representatives before the Senate the bills were referred to their appropriate committees by the Chair?

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I did not understand there was any action whatever taken, but they were simply handed down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands no action was taken and therefore rules that no business has been transacted.

Mr. BINGHAM. What I asked was whether the Chair did not refer the bills to the appropriate committees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not remember, but it was an erroneous ruling if he did.

Mr. BINGHAM. In view of the fact that the Chair did refer the bills to the appropriate committees it would seem to the Senator from Connecticut that business has been transacted and therefore the point of no quorum was well taken.

Mr. WATSON. The Chair has ruled that no business has been transacted, and therefore such a ruling would be a mistake. I think the Senator is standing on thin ice.

Mr. BINGHAM. Then I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate? [Putting the question.] The ayes have it, and the Chair is overruled.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Chair being overruled——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was in error. The decision of the Chair is sustained.

Mr. COPELAND. My colleague has raised the point of no quorum, which I renew.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will rule that no business has been transacted since the quorum was called before.

Mr. COPELAND. A question of parliamentary procedure was ruled on by the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood his ruling was sustained by the Senate and therefore that no business had been transacted.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut will state it.

Mr. BINGHAM. Does the Chair rule that when the Senate votes to sustain a decision of the Chair, that is not the transaction of business?

Mr. COPELAND. We had that very question before us the other night when the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] was in the chair, and it was ruled to be business, of course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Edwards	King	Simmons
Barkley	Fess	McKellar	Smith
Bayard	Fletcher	McMaster	Smoot
Bingham	Frazier	McNary	Steck

Bratton	Goff	Norbeck	Thomas, Okla.
Brookhart	Gould	Norris	Trammell
Broussard	Greene	Nye	Tydings
Bruce	Hale	Oddie	Tyson
Burton	Harris	Pine	Vandenberg

Dale	Johnson	Sackett	Watson
Deneen	Jones	Schall	Wheeler
Dill	Kendrick	Sheppard
Edge	Keyes	Shortridge

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I was attempting to place before the Senate the fact that the Department of Commerce is now doing a large part of the administrative work which it has a right to do and which under the proper administration of the radio law it would be required to do. If the Radio Commission will perform its functions as the radio law contemplated it should perform them—Mr. President, I dislike to be fussy about disorder in the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will please be in order.

Mr. COPELAND. What I am doing in this matter, Mr. President, is because of a deep-seated conviction that the enactment of the proposed law would damage the radio art and incidentally harm the country.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina will state his question of order.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to hear the Senator from New York. I do not know what he is discussing, but he is discussing it in a very illuminating way, I know, and I think we ought to have order in the Chamber so that we may hear him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will please be in order.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am very much obliged to the Senator from North Carolina, and I want to say to him that I am striving to confine myself strictly to the question at issue. We have had one or two pleasantries, but I think that 99 per cent of everything I have said has been along the line of the question we are discussing.

I feel very strongly on this subject. I feel that Senators should be informed regarding it, because it is a matter of vital interest to the Senators who represent every State in the Union and every section of the country. An effort is being made here to hamstring the radio commission, to keep it from doing its full duty for the protection of the country in order that rights may be safeguarded, and the great art may develop without interference. I have been reading and shall continue pretty soon to read——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I knew the Senator was discussing something, but I could not hear him, and I wanted order so I might find out what he was discussing.

Mr. COPELAND. I fear either that the Senator has been absent from the Chamber or that I have failed more miserably than I had expected.

Mr. SIMMONS. There has been too much disorder in the Chamber; that is all.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I appeal to you, if need be, to station the Sergeant at Arms at the head of the center aisle to see that order is maintained. We should have quiet. Every Senator should be permitted to hear, if he so desires, and if he does not wish to hear what I have to say, the Marble Room and the cloak room are available, and more than that, all of God's out-of-doors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. Caldwell pointed out in his testimony that practically all of this work, which is supposedly done by the Radio Commission, must of necessity be done, because of the lack of available technical help in the commission itself, by the Department of Commerce, which is fully equipped to do the work.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The occupants of the galleries will be in order.

Mr. COPELAND. The other night, when we discussed this subject somewhat, I suggested to the chairman of the committee in debate that the bill ought not to pass; that we should permit the law that is now on the statute books to operate, in which event the Department of Commerce would do all this technical work, and the commission would act as an appellate body. He said it would take three or four months for the department to prepare itself for this work; and the matter now before the Senate is my amendment to the bill proposing to extend the operation of the present plan to the 1st of June, which will give three months—March, April, and May. If Senators feel that that time is too short, I am willing to extend it more than that; but I am, personally, utterly unwilling to have it go over until another Congress comes into being.

That is the scheme. That is what is intended by many who advocate this measure, because they want to have it an open question when the next Congress—the Seventy-first Congress—meets in regular session, in order that they may attempt to build up another great body, a communications division, to take care of radio, telephone, and telegraph.

That is the scheme. That is the plan. That is the system that they have in mind. It is to have another great body of government, with hundreds of employees, and spending millions of the people's money—a communications division.

I am unwilling to have that happen. The arrangement that we have now is an inexpensive one. These men will be paid $10,000 a year—they have been paid that; that is, $50,000—and there will be the usual appropriations for clerk-hire and clerical expense generally. Comparatively modest sums will take care of the judicial side, the appellate side, of the radio work. We have all the machinery in the Department of Commerce already arranged for and now operating to take care of the administrative side, and those administrative details are practically finished at this moment.

Now, listen to the testimony.

Mr. Caldwell was on the witness stand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order. The Senator will suspend until the Senate is in order. [A pause.] The Senator will proceed.

Mr. COPELAND. In reply to a question in the hearings, Commissioner Caldwell said (p. 147):

> At the present time all of the amateur licenses of the 16,000 amateurs, which is the largest class of radio licenses, are being issued by the Department of Commerce, are being handled by their local supervisors, which has lifted a great load off of the commission.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. COPELAND. I must warn the Senator that under the strict-construction rule that has been placed upon me I can yield merely for a question.

Mr. BAYARD. Merely for a question. I merely want to ask the Senator what was the date of this hearing, and what was the date to which Mr. Caldwell referred when he made this statement in regard to the amateur radio operators?

Mr. COPELAND. This was in February of this year—last month.

Mr. BAYARD. And what was the date of the operation of these 16,000 radio operators?

Mr. COPELAND. At that time.

Mr. BAYARD. At the same time?

Mr. COPELAND. At the time he was testifying; that is, last month, February of this year; all of the amateur licenses of the 16,000 amateurs had been issued, and these stations were being operated under the Department of Commerce.

By the way, it is an interesting thing to know that these boys, these amateurs, have tremendously developed the art of radio. They were the ones who discovered the tremendous value of the short waves. Some of those boys are picking up stations all over the world. It is a very interesting thing to note what they are doing; and the work done by the so-called amateurs has been one of the most important features of radio development.

In addition to these licenses which the amateurs get from the Department of Commerce are the technical schools where teaching is done. I quote further from Mr. Caldwell:

> All of the technical schools also have their licenses issued by the Department of Commerce. So that the Department of Commerce, with its trained staff of 65 technical men and about 60 clerks, is handling a tremendous inspection and supervision job, and, in addition, there has been delegated to it an administration job.

Mr. President, the Republican cloakroom is just the other side of the partition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. COPELAND. I do not spend much time in that cloakroom, but I understand it is very comfortable; and if Senators would use it, it would relieve the disorder of the Senate.

Since the Vice President has returned to the chair, I should like to repeat what I said a little while ago; and he will forgive me if I say it. I may never have another opportunity during his administration to say that no man ever came to Washington and more endeared himself to the people of this community than the genial Vice President of the United States. On this side of the aisle, Mr. President, you are just as beloved as you are on the other side; and we never can fail to thank you for your fairness and the splendid way in which you have conducted your office. You have found a place in our hearts that will endure forever and ever; and I speak of that because I want to put a little sugar coating, if you will permit me, on this statement which I shall make:

The Vice President has been very critical of filibusters, and of the rules which permit many delays and obstructions in business, and all that sort of thing. I find myself in perfect accord with his view. I have believed in, and have had pending in the Congress ever since I came here, a rule to do away with unanimous consent. That is, so much of our business is done under unanimous consent.

A question comes up, and it is Monday morning, and a Senator has that "blue Monday" feeling, or things have not gone to suit him, and he is somewhat disgruntled, and he objects. Under those circumstances, I think the rule ought to provide for this question from the Chair: "Is the objection sustained?" or "Is the objection seconded?" or "Is the objection indorsed?" and to require that four other Senators, or some number—we will say four—should indorse that objection. In other words, I believe that one Senator should not have the power to say, "The Senate can not proceed," but that at least five men or three men or seven men should be required, whatever number might be determined upon. Then we would do away with the obstruction to legislation which so frequently is observed in this Chamber. I think that is one of the great faults of our system, and I believe the suggestion I have made would do much to relieve it. I discussed this matter at great length with the late Senator Cummins when he was the acting Vice President, and he thoroughly indorsed it. He said he believed it would do much to facilitate the work of the Senate.

Before I end this particular diversion, I want to make this further observation in the hearing of the Vice President:

I determined that if it ever became a matter of conscience with me to hold the floor for a long time, I would devote myself exclusively to the subject. That is the fault with what we call the filibuster.

I determined that I would either not speak at all, or else attempt, in an honest way, to present my views regarding the pending question, and not permit myself to be led into quotations from works entirely foreign to the question at issue. We have here a subject which has overwhelmed the world. The development of radio is an amazing thing. Men stand in astonishment at what has happened in the development of this great art. But there has been made no effort in the Congress of the United States to study these measures, and I believe from the bottom of my heart that this proposed legislation is detrimental to the development of the radio art, and particularly detrimental to the preservation of the rights of our country in the matter of radio, and the development of radio.

I have in my system more material relating to this subject, and when the time comes in this discussion that I can no longer talk about radio, I am going to leave the floor, but in the meantime there are things which it may be well to consider, and if we do consider them and study them, in my judgment, any Senator is likely to take the same view that I take as to what should be done.

We were speaking about the relationship of the Department of Commerce to the commission. We have the commission. The law of 1927 provides for a commission of five. But we immediately proceeded to hamstring the commission. We appointed the commissioners for 2, 3, 4, and 5 years, respectively, and then we venture to say in this bill that all the commissions shall expire next February.

We have this division of work between the Department of Commerce and the commission; that is, we have it theoretically. We should have it actually. We are providing for the commissioners to sit in on a lot of conferences and take sides in controversies, consuming their time; but, worse than that, disqualifying them to judge impartially, as the law says, de novo.

These same men, I may say to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], who make the decisions about wave lengths, stations, and all the petty affairs connected with the technical side of the radio, are the men who are appealed to to pass judgment on whether their administrative acts are correct or improper. I do not need to say to any Member of the Senate, or to point out, how absurd that arrangement is. It is not right at all. It is not fair to men who have controversies with the Radio Commission. If the man who has a measure of importance to him takes it to the technical men in the Department of Commerce, or the Radio Commission, wherever they are, he fights his battle there, and he wants fresh judgment on the case, and he has a right to say, "Let us take this to some men who will review the facts." As it is now, Mr. President, you take your question for review to the very men who rendered the decision in the first place.

That is not common sense, and I am sure every Senator here must recognize that fact. That is the way it will be if the law is put into operation as contemplated in 1927, and the thing that is the law, but because these extensions have been made, one last year, and the one talked about now, the Radio Commission is prevented from being free from those details of administration.

How far have they gone in the matter of that administration? Every Senator knows, because we had great debates here, with the charts all around the sides of the Chamber, the question about the division of wave lengths and power between the States and the sections, zones, and so forth.

How far have they gone with that work? How much longer do we need to have the Radio Commission to do the work which these technical advisers should long since have been doing successfully?

I do not ask Senators to take my judgment. Let us see what Commissioner Caldwell said about it. I quote from page 147 of the hearings on the question of continuing the Federal Radio Commission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GLENN in the chair). The Senate will be in order.

Mr. COPELAND. I wonder why it is that the disorder is always on the Republican side? I have observed for years the dissensions in that party, the divisions that have taken place, but it does seem to me as if there should be order on the other side. I ask the Presiding Officer if he will not see to it that the Republicans are in order. I dislike to have the RECORD show that the Republicans are in great disorder, but I confess they are. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is read by thousands of citizens of this country, and they will be grieved to learn that Republican Senators have not been observing the rules of strict construction imposed upon the speaker by a Republican.

As regards the division of work between the Department of Commerce and the commission, Mr. Caldwell had something to say. He had first described that the 16,000 amateurs and the technical schools were under the department, and this occurred:

The CHAIRMAN. Well now, let us find out about that. They handle the licensing of all of the amateurs?

Commissioner CALDWELL. Yes, Senator, and of the technical schools.

The CHAIRMAN. Was that turned over to them by the commission, or did the commission never have authority itself to issue the licenses?

Commissioner CALDWELL. The original authority resides in the commission.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Commissioner CALDWELL. But as a matter of practical operation the commission has turned that class of licensing over to the Department of Commerce, which has carried it on and very successfully, because the commission is not equipped and has not equipped itself to handle that vast amount of amateur work.

As I have already pointed out, there are 16,000 of these amateur licenses. If the pending bill shall pass, the Congress will express its unwillingness to have the commission relieved of the responsibility of original jurisdiction. If this bill becomes a law, it will provide in effect that the commissioners must continue to be busy about details which could be handled by the clerks in the department, or by the technical men.

So, simply because some men think that by holding this matter open they can bludgeon the next Congress into passing a bill to provide for a communications department, because they want to do that and saddle upon the taxpayers of the country another great big department costing millions upon millions of dollars, because they have that scheme in mind with the appointment of a lot of new officials and to have more patronage and to make a political machine more powerful, they are unwilling to let this department do the work in the reasonable way provided by law which was enacted in 1926. That is what we have before us. That is the plan innocent men are fooled into supporting unaware of the significance of the undertaking.

But what can men say who study the RECORD to find out just exactly what this diligent and heartbreaking commission has done? There undoubtedly was good reason in the first year of the life of the commission to do as we propose. The legal questions had not risen as yet. The distribution of the short waves and long waves and all the waves had to be arranged. It was undoubtedly wise for a period of time, and perhaps up to this time, to let the commission do those things. But what is the situation to-day? Commissioner Caldwell said, on page 147 of the hearings:

As I see it, the clean-up work of reconstruction which followed the 1926 breakdown of the law (and which, of course, was the chief reason for appointing this Federal Radio Commission) this work of reallocating the broadcasting band is now 80 to 85 per cent finished.

Eighty to eighty-five per cent finished! Think of it. The administrative work is 80 to 85 per cent finished; and there is no reason under the sun, so far as I can discover, why this commission now might not be given the job of acting as an appellate court, as an advisory body to supervise any enterprise where there was a question in the Department of Commerce—as Mr. Hoover pointed out—where there was need of advice of an unbiased tribunal to determine whether or not the act of an individual administrator was wise or not. But now the time has come when we should give the commission its powers as an appellate body exclusively.

Mr. President, the Republicans have broken loose again. Will you not exert your large influence to see that there is order on the other side of the Chamber?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr COPELAND. I was reading a little while ago from a statement made by another Mr. Caldwell, not the commissioner, but in order that the RECORD may be clear I remind Senators that it is Mr. Lewis G. Caldwell, general counsel of the Radio Commission and chairman of the bar association committee on radio. He spoke about the act of 1927, to which I have just made reference, and said:

The first year passed and Congress extended this state of affairs for another year, so for almost two years the commission has been exercising this direct authority over radio. This authority expires on March 15, less than three weeks from to-day, unless Congress passes the bill. The bill that is now pending proposes to extend the commission's powers for still a third year. It passed the House of Representatives almost unanimously but is having a run for its life in the Senate where, although a clear majority seems to be in favor of it, one Senator is conducting a determined opposition to it.

That is what we intended after the first year, that all detailed matters should be handled in the Department of Commerce and appeals should be taken to the commission. Mr. Caldwell in his radio talk continues:

This session of Congress draws to an automatic close on March 4, when the new administration comes in, and consequently there are only a few more days left. So far when the bill has come up this Senator has let it be known that he is going to keep on talking on it until the time is up, and other Senators are accusing him of a filibuster, a charge which he denies. So right now it is impossible to say whether during the coming year radio licenses will be issued by the commission or the Department of Commerce.

I suppose, Mr. President, that Mr. Caldwell was referring to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], who seems determined to pass a bill which is a very unwise measure. So I suppose that he is the man Mr. Caldwell has in mind.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from New York a question, if he will permit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield for a question.

Mr. BLEASE. I do not know much about the radio business. I have been opposed to the bill and the commission ever since it started. I have noticed recently that there is a report that it is intended to put a radio in the Capitol; in fact, in this very room. Four years ago when I was here on the 4th day of March they brought into this Chamber the President and the President elect, the Vice President and the Vice President elect, the Congress of the United States, the Supreme Court judges—in fact, the whole Government was here present. I was thinking if we bring in that same group this year—the President and the President elect, the Vice President and the Vice President elect, and all the others—that it might be possible, if a radio is put up in this room, for some fellow to destroy the whole American Government in one blow. For instance, if some one should have one of these bombs and throw it over into this room, as has been done in the city of the present occupant of the chair [Mr. GLENN], it would kill the President and the President elect, the Vice President and the Vice President elect, all of the judiciary, all of the Senators, and all of the Congressmen in one blow. See how easily we could all be wiped out. I want to ask the Senator, who is an expert on radio, if that radio is put back in the corner of the Chamber here close to my seat whether it would be possible for one of these anarchists to send something through it and blow us all out of here? [Laughter.]

Mr. COPELAND. That would be a calamity too dire to contemplate.

Mr. BLEASE. It would if I had to go. I do not know about some of the others. [Laughter.]

Mr. COPELAND. I hope such a calamity will not happen.

Mr. BLEASE. But the Senator can see the danger that all of us would be in.

Mr. COPELAND. There are infinite possibilities in the radio business.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. WATSON. No, Mr. President; I am not asking the Senator to yield. I desire to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WATSON. Did the Senator from South Carolina ask a question or make a speech?

Mr. BLEASE. I asked a question. In all seriousness I asked it. With all of us in here and with a radio outfit in here, I still say it is a serious proposition, because the man who wanted to do it could destroy the representatives of this entire Government almost in a second. I do not think they all ought to be in here at once. I am asking the Senator from New York as an expert on radio. If we all get together in here and he says it will be dangerous, then I propose to move to-morrow to prevent it being put in here. I have just been informed that that is a fact that it might happen. If it is dangerous I think some precaution should be taken. The doorkeepers we have at the doors of the Senate could not prevent such a thing. They are all mighty nice gentlemen and I like them, but I could go up there myself and throw five of them over into this Chamber, and I am not a physically strong man myself.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I want to ask whether the Senator from South Carolina has asked a question or made some observations?

Mr. BLEASE. I say that is a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules that the Senator from South Carolina made some observations as well as asking a question.

Mr. WATSON. I understand from that that the Chair——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. WATSON. This is a parliamentary inquiry. I am not asking the Senator to yield. I understand that the Senator from New York now enters upon his second speech.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana is out of order.

Mr. WATSON. No. I am submitting a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator from Indiana is not in his place.

Mr. WATSON. I do not have to be.

Mr. COPELAND. The rules require that he should rise in his place and address the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana will return to his place, and then, if he desires, submit his parliamentary inquiry.

(Mr. WATSON returned to his seat.)

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I rise to submit a parliamentary inquiry from my own place. Am I to understand that the Senator from New York is now making his second speech?

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator from New York said that he would reply to a question. It was the business of the Presiding Officer to see that the statement made by the Senator from South Carolina was in the nature of a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules that the Senator from New York in yielding stated that he yielded only for the purpose of a question and that this is only a continuation of his first speech.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I want to state that if the ruling of the Chair had been to the contrary I would have taken the floor and made a little longer speech possibly than the Senator from New York will make if we let him go on.

Mr. COPELAND. To continue the statement of Mr. Lewis G. Caldwell:

There is another bill which has been introduced in both Houses of Congress, declaring that all broadcasting stations are public utilities, and requiring all of them that are commercial in nature to transmit for all persons on equal terms at rates to be fixed by the Federal Radio Commission.

Of course that raises a very important question, one that will have to be dealt with in some appropriate way, as it will be in the course of time. Then he says further in this article:

Another bill proposes to prohibit the commission to authorize any station to use more than 10,000 watts. Still another would require the commission to provide for 50 cleared channels of the total of 90, instead of 40 as at present.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. HEFLIN. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] yielded to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BLEASE]. The Senator from South Carolina did not stop with a question; he made some observations as to his own views about putting the radio in this Chamber. I submit that that was a speech injected by the Senator from South Carolina into the speech of the Senator from New York with his consent, because he made no protest, and that, therefore, that is the end of his first speech, and that he is now proceeding on his second speech on the same subject. I make that point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair previously ruled upon that point of order to the effect that the Senator from New York is now continuing his first speech. The point of order is the substance of one heretofore raised.

Mr. McKELLAR. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator from New York shall take his seat and then offer another amendment and speak to that, he may continue to offer amendments so long as he desires, may he not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules that he may.

Mr. WATSON. Another parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WATSON. If the Senator from New York shall offer an amendment and that amendment shall be voted on, he then loses the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules that the Senator from Indiana is correct.

Mr. DENEEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. COPELAND. Just a moment. What is my status now, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has the floor and is continuing his first speech.

Mr. COPELAND. I am on my first speech?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is on his first speech.

Mr. DENEEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield to me?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I must know why the Senator from Illinois desires me to yield.

Mr. DENEEN. I desire to ask to have certain nominations referred to the appropriate committees.

Mr. COPELAND. Is there any reason why that may not be done, Mr. President? I am perfectly willing it shall be, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that it may be done.

Mr. COUZENS. I object.

Mr. WATSON. What is the proposition?

Mr. DENEEN. The proposition is to refer certain nominations which have just come in to the appropriate committees for consideration.

Mr. COUZENS. I object unless the Senator from New York shall then begin his second speech.

Mr. COPELAND. I am sorry, but I could hardly do that; I am very sorry, indeed; but the RECORD will show that the objection which has prevented his request being complied with has come from the side of the Chamber of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. COPELAND. I can yield merely to a question, and provided I do not lose the floor.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not want to cause the Senator to lose the floor.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator from New York will lose the floor if he yields, unless he is willing to go on with his second speech.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator from New York could offer another amendment, if he desired to do so.

Mr. McKELLAR. He can offer as many amendments as he wishes and speak to them; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. COPELAND. I think, Mr. President, that it is utterly unfair to Senators here who have committee reports, who have minor matters——

Mr. COUZENS. A point of order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. COUZENS. Is the Senator from New York remaining at his seat?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules that he is.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Montana what it is that he wishes to present, so that I may determine whether or not I shall yield for the purpose? I can not yield for a speech. What is the question that the Senator from Montana wishes to ask?

Mr. WHEELER. I want to ask the Senator from New York if he will yield to me while I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to consider and pass a bill which has passed the House providing:

> That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Frank C. Russell, who was a member of Eighth Battery, Field Artillery, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of that organization on the 3d day of October, 1904: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, if that request shall be made, I shall object.

Mr. COPELAND. I am sorry, I will say to the Senator from Montana. I should have been very happy to have him ask for unanimous consent for the purpose he has indicated.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the Senator from New York has permitted another Senator to bring up an entirely different question than the one the Senator from New York is discussing. He has also permitted another Senator, in his time, to read a bill to the Senate and after the bill was read the Senator from Pennsylvania stated that he would object to allowing consideration of it at this time. That is transacting business. The Senator from New York yielded to it; and I submit if that is within the rule there will be no end to a filibuster in this body. If a Senator can be allowed to permit another Senator to do that, he could be allowed to let another Senator read a book. For instance, if a Senator should rise and say to the one occupying the floor, "I should like to print this in the RECORD," and the Senator holding the floor should say, "What is it?" the Senator interrupting could stand up and read 40 pages of a book; he could do that just as much as the Senator from Montana could read a 1-page bill. I submit the point of order that the Senator from New York is entering on his second speech since the interruption of the Senator from Montana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules that no objection was made by the Senator from New York, and no objection was made by any other Senator, and that the Senator from New York is still on his first speech.

Mr. COPELAND. I should like to say, Mr. President, that I want to observe the rules of the Senate strictly, and not only to observe the written rules of the Senate, but I shall undertake so long as I have the floor to discuss the question at issue and not outside questions. It is strange that Senators on the other side who have become remarkably active in the last hour or so, although most of the time they are less active, should be so trivially technical.

I have in my possession 40 or 50 amendments. I have technical ways of getting the floor. I do not want to do it in that way. I want to observe the amenities and to present my cause in a gentlemanly way, and likewise in harmony with the letter and spirit of the rules of the United States Senate. That is my purpose. If Senators are displeased because I am taking a lot of time, I am sorry. This is called a "great deliberative body." The traditions of the Senate indicate the right of a Senator to discuss matters. I must confess that in my discussion here to-day I am not discussing a subject with Senators, for they are not here, but I am trying to let the country know what sort of a game is being put over, or at least what the effect will be of the proposed legislation, which I think is harmful to the country, and in that sense is a game in the way I have used the word.

This proposed legislation is dangerous legislation; it is unwise legislation; and, in the large sense, it is improper legislation, and should not be permitted to be enacted into law. I would not be true to myself, and to my convictions if I did not do what I could to educate the country to what, in my judgment, is best for the country as regards the radio problem.

I am not intimidated or discouraged or particularly annoyed by the trivial technicalities of Senators across the aisle. If they choose to resort to them, let them do their worst. I am going to tell my story in any way I can and in spite of the constant interruptions of others, no matter what may be the motives which inspire them to make those interruptions.

Mr. Caldwell was speaking about providing for 50 cleared channels of the total of 90, instead of 40 as at present.

He was speaking along that line, and then he said:

> You probably know that by cleared channel is meant one on which only one station is operating during the evening hours, so that the channel will be entirely free of the form of interference known as heterodyne, and which is usually perceived in the form of a whistle.

When we listen to the radio occasionally we hear a shrill whistle showing interference in the channel, indicating that two stations are getting into the same channel and producing that heterodyne effect. Then Mr. Caldwell continues his statement, as follows:

> Still another bill proposes to take radio and combine it under one authority with our wire systems, such as telegraph, telephone, and cable lines, the whole to be regulated by what will be known as a communications commission.

That is the milk in the coconut; that is what this is all about. We are going to have a communications commission; we are going to set up another three or four hundred million dollar department with a lot of Republican employees, and add to the machinery of the party. I want to say to the communications commission party that I do not believe Herbert Hoover will tolerate any such nonsense when he comes into office. I do not believe Mr. Coolidge would either. The country is sick and tired of expensive commissions; it is sick and tired of paying taxes. This year Congress will appropriate nearly five billion dollars—think of it, nearly $5,000,000,000, five thousand millions of dollars—and the State governments another billion, and local governments five billions more. Eleven billions of taxes placed upon the shoulders of the American people, and the productive income of our people amounts to only ninety billions. One-eighth of the earnings of our people spent to pay taxes. That means that every wage earner gives six or seven weeks of his earnings every year to pay the taxes.

Do we want any more commissions of that sort? Mr. President, you know we do not; and the people will not tolerate any such scheme as a communications commission.

No action is expected on any of these bills at the present short session, and there will not be any action on any such bills for many a long session, if I am any prophet.

(At this point Mr. COPELAND yielded to Mr. BLEASE, who moved a recess, and the roll was called, after which Mr. WATSON presented a cloture petition and debate took place.)

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I want to say a few things to the Senator from Indiana, if I may be honored by his attention.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). The attention of the Senator from Indiana is requested.

Mr. WATSON. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. COPELAND. In the first place, I want to thank the Senator from Indiana for the great compliment he has paid me. I possess a considerable degree of physical energy and I had not realized that he feared that I might talk until the Sabbath. I knew he had the cloture petition in his pocket. It has been used as a club in the corridors against me—not by the Senator from Indiana but by others. But I want to say that it would not make any difference to me whether the debate were in the closing days of the session or the beginning of the session; I should express my views anyhow.

I am inclined to resent the imputation that I am speaking as I am to-day because I am hoping at the last minute of this session to defeat the pending legislation. I should make that effort if it were the beginning of the session, and I shall make the same effort if the Senator brings the matter up in the next Congress. It was not necessary for the Senator from Indiana to bring in his cloture petition. Common sense dictates that it is not humanly possible to carry on this particular matter until next Sunday, but I am going to have my say regardless of whether we vote on the matter next Monday or to-morrow or at any other time. It was not necessary, so far as I am concerned, to spring a cloture petition on me on the theory that I would then keep still because I am apparently defeated. Defeat is not the worst thing in the world. It is worse to lie down and take things without a fight than it is to be licked in a square fight. I am going to say what I think about this business. If it takes me until Sunday, all right, I will keep on until Sunday. If I get through by midnight, I will stop at midnight. But I am going to send a message to the American people, and it makes no difference to me whether a cloture petition or 100 of them be presented, I am going to have my say. I represent a sovereign State, a State of some consequence in this Union, with one-tenth of the people of all the United States living in it. Those people have honored me within a few weeks by re-electing me to the Senate, and I am not going to be driven off the floor by technicalities or "clubs," to use the word of the Senator from Indiana, who said that he had this cloture as a club to hold over the Senator from New York. I was brought up where clubs are common, and this particular common club does not frighten me.

In his radio address Mr. Caldwell said further:

> Congress is not the only legislative body which has given attention to radio legislation. One of the most interesting and difficult problems of radio law to-day is the extent to which State legislatures and city councils can go in the subject.

How many of us have thought of that? This is not a problem that can be dealt with by Congress alone. It is a problem that runs into the States, into the municipalities, into the various localities. All of which indicates to me that it is very necessary that we should have an alert commission made up of men not alone technically trained, but particularly who have had legal training, because to preserve the national rights to radio it is necessary that they should be the most alert sort of a commission with time enough to devote to the particular matters of legal interest.

The Senator from Indiana, the possessor of the club that he is going to use to smash the Senator from New York, wants to take the commission by the throat, wants to stifle it, and say to it, "Just do the best you can with your job, but you can not stay longer than a year." What can we expect in the way of personnel on such a commission? I have no criticism of the commission we have had. I think those men have made great personal sacrifices, and I honor them for the sacrifices they have made. They were interested in the pioneer work, the development of this great art, and so they gave of their time and of their power. They have rendered a public service, but in the nature of things we can not expect men to come to that commission simply because of their enthusiasm for it. It must become a life calling. It must be an appointment of sufficient length of tenure to justify a man in changing his manner of life, in giving up his career and coming here to the seat of government to devote himself to this cause. I read to you what Mr. Caldwell, the counsel for the commission, said about having a home in Chicago and another one somewhere else and was living here in Washington. He gave up all those because of his interest in this particular cause, because it was a pioneer and developing cause.

But we are down now to "brass tacks," if I may use a slang phrase. We have reached the point now where this is a real, honest-to-goodness business, and we can not expect men of the talent such as we wish to command to leave their localities and give up their professions and come to Washington unless it is known by each man that he has a secure tenure of office for a given time. That is why in the first bill we provided that men should be appointed for 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 years, and that ultimately all of them would serve for 6 years in order that they might carry on through a long period of time the many details of this great work. So among the problems with which we have to deal is the problem of the relation of the Federal Government to the States and municipalities.

Mr. Caldwell continued:

> Some time ago I sent out to the attorney general of each State, and to the corporation counsel of each city in the United States having a population of 50,000 or more, an inquiry as to what laws and ordinances, if any, had been enacted. A very generous response resulted and it has provided the commission with a wealth of extremely interesting material.
> Let me give you examples of what some of the States have done.
> In Michigan a statute gives a State commission extensive authority over the operation of radio stations, authorized the State commission to prescribe time schedules and to prohibit the operation of two stations simultaneously if interference results. Violation of the act is punishable by fine or imprisonment. These powers overlap a great deal of the powers conferred by Congress on the Federal Radio Commission.

Mr. President, what is going to happen? Suppose the Federal Government through its Department of Commerce attempts to regulate broadcasting and then the State of New York—or, to be specific, I will take the State of Michigan, because they have actually done it. Suppose the State of Michigan enacts laws to regulate broadcasting, and then the appropriate legislative body in the city of Detroit, perhaps the city council, enacts regulations relative to broadcasting in the city. Think of the complications with which we have to deal. We have the Federal regulations, the State regulations, and the municipal regulations. Somebody must coordinate those different activities and legislative acts. Then there is a very important work to be done by the legal department of the Radio Commission. Any man who is interested in the development of the short wave or any other activity involving radio distribution must be interested in the question and he must have some place where he can go for some sort of action, and the natural place is the Federal Radio Commission.

I was thinking just now, as I looked about the Chamber, that it is very interesting to see it when it is empty. It seems we are top-heavy, without any reflection upon the two or three Senators who are now in the Chamber. How much more brains we have in the galleries, have we not? [Laughter in the galleries.] Really the whole establishment is top-heavy, because all the brains are up there in the galleries. [Laughter.] I want the country to know the details of this problem; and they, the great citizenry of our country, are the ones qualified to pass judgment upon it and to determine whether the country wants to have the commission hamstrung and deprived of full authority to deal with the questions involved, or whether it wants it to continue to be a commission like the department of licenses, below the head of the commissioner in some city, and require of the commissioners that they should spend all their time in petty details. Of course, common sense says that the proper way to deal with the problem is to permit the board to be the appellate body, the advisory body, the judicial body, to deal with these problems in a large way, and let the petty details be done in the offices of the Department of Commerce.

It is not alone in the State of Michigan where we find activities carried on in the name of the State or the locality. I quote once more from the statement of Mr. Louis G. Caldwell, the general counsel of the Radio Commission:

In Nevada broadcasting stations are classified as public utilities, and the public service commission of that State is invested with the same power that is has over other classes of public utilities. I think most lawyers will agree with me that the validity of such statutes is very doubtful.

That is an interesting statement which is made by Mr. Caldwell:

The validity of such statutes is very doubtful.

Who is going to test the validity of those statutes? Who is going to determine whether the rights of the public are conserved or not? Who is going to determine the best way of handling a problem of this nature? That is the sort of problem that the Radio Commission has to deal with, and it should be given money enough to be supplied with all the talent it needs to carry on this work of coordination. As Mr. Caldwell has suggested, somebody must determine the validity of such statutes as we find in Nevada.

Then, too, quoting further from this radio talk, I find this:

Now let us see what cities and villages have done. They have been chiefly interested in ordinances of three kinds.

A large number of them have made it unlawful to operate various instruments or machines that cause electrical interference between certain hours in the evening. Some of these ordinances list the instruments and include a large variety of devices, such as electric signs, electric pianos, violet ray and X-ray machines, laboratory chargers, etc.

Some of the ordinances which were carelessly worded, if read literally, would prohibit the running of any street car between 6 o'clock in the evening and midnight.

Senators know if there be an electric refrigerator in their apartments or houses, and they turn on the radio at the same time that the motor is operating in the electric refrigerator, an interference occurs that is distressing. In these days, where that particular fact has been called to the attention of at least one legislative body, an ordinance has been passed seeking to prohibit any sort of activity which will produce interference with the radio reception. That raises another question that must be dealt with by somebody. All these things ought to be studied and reviewed by the Radio Commission.

Then, to quote further from Mr. Caldwell, he says:

Another set of ordinances is aimed at the operation of loud-speakers in such a way as to disturb the neighborhood.

That is what the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BLEASE] was afraid of, as he stated a little while ago. He is afraid that the radio, if accompanied by a loud speaker, might bring so much noise from the outside that it would disturb the Senate. Nothing disturbs the Senate at meal time. Senators now are in the dining room. Of course, it is a great temptation for me at this point to read a lecture on health. A man lives on one-third of what he eats, and the doctors live on the other two-thirds. [Laughter.] I am afraid that the Presiding Officer did not get that. Mr. President, you live on one-third of what you eat and the doctors live on the other two-thirds. Senators know everything except how to live. It is only by the strict observance of the rules of hygiene that a man can keep in proper condition to conduct a filibuster. [Laughter.] Of course, Mr. President, I am not conducting one; so my state of health is of small concern; but I recommend this suggestion to any who may be interested.

To repeat the quotation, Mr. Caldwell said:

Another set of ordinances is aimed at the operation of loud-speakers in such a way as to disturb the neighborhood. Still another set of ordinances covers the manner in which your aerial shall be constructed.

Both of those are important. There is nothing more important in a city than to control the noises and nuisances that affect people and keep them awake and shatter their nerves. So far as the aerials are concerned, it is important to regulate them in order that fire protection may not be interfered with. In case of fire an aerial improperly constructed might be in the way of a fire apparatus. Furthermore, it might be dangerous in other respects than that, particularly one which might be put up insecurely on poles, as the poles might fall. Those, it strikes me, are very proper ordinances dealing with local matters wholly, but when it comes to the consideration of the question of whether radio is a public utility and whether the Government owns the ether, those large questions of legal construction must be determined by somebody, and they are among those matters which must be determined by the Radio Commission acting as a judicial body.

One city at least has an ordinance that no broadcasting station may be operated within the city without a permit, and that none may be operated either within or in 2 miles outside the city with more than 500 watts power.

Probably some of these ordinances are perfectly valid, but others, if they were allowed to stand, would run directly counter to the power of the Federal Government over radio.

That is perfectly apparent; it is a matter of vital importance, and one which must be studied and a proper remedy discovered. So there is a great work to be done by the Federal commission in determining the power of the Federal Government.

To quote further from Mr. Caldwell:

I feel that it is very important that, before cities and States rush into hasty legislation on radio, they consult with attorneys for the Federal Radio Commission.

They would have to consult with somebody besides the Federal Radio Commission, because so long as we leave in the hands of this commission the petty details of administration they will have no time to deal with the larger problems which have to do with the oversight and control of the radio art.

I quote further:

In what I have to say to you I find it difficult to refrain from telling you of things that have come to my attention, not only in connection with the committee's work but also during my brief period of service as general counsel of the Federal Radio Commission. I went off the pay roll last Saturday night, but am still lingering to try and complete certain work in which I have been engaged.

If you could only drop in at the commission's offices in Washington and observe the daily routine of work, I am sure that you would express your heartfelt sympathy for its members. They are all able men of high integrity, working longer hours, I think, than any other tribunal in Washington and facing more baffling problems.

The broadcasting stations alone, there being over 600 of them, would be enough to drive any regulating authority to desperation, with their conflicting claims, charges, and countercharges. Nearly all of them want more power, or better wave lengths, or more time, and, since there are only 96 channels to put them on—and 6 of these belong exclusively to Canada—they can not possibly all have what they want.

Occasionally one of them that is dissatisfied proceeds to stir up its listening public, sometimes without explaining just what the difficulty is, and the result is a deluge of mail headed for Washington. Some of it goes to Senators and Congressmen, some of it is addressed to the President, but most of it arrives at the commission.

In order to make sure that the commission is impressed with the importance of these communications, a large proportion of the senders use registered mail, special delivery, air mail, and the telegraph office. Then, in order to clinch their claims to better assignments, such stations send in support either by affidavit or personal witnesses, from all the local authorities and notables, the mayor, the aldermen, the judges, the presidents of all the clubs, and particularly the women's clubs, the hospitals, and in many cases the governor of the State and its Senators or Congressmen.

Those are some of the things which have to be faced by the Radio Commission. No wonder that they have no time to give to the judicial functions which are intrusted to them under the law but which they are not permitted to exercise because of the insistence of Senators who want to extend the commission for one more year and then another one more year, and heaven knows how many such extensions of time after that. It is utterly wrong; it is conducive of harm to the enterprise and bound ultimately to do it irreparable damage.

I wish to quote further from Mr. Caldwell; and I do this to impress upon you gentlemen—upon you, Mr. President, and the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAYFIELD], who is always faithful to his duties—I want to impress upon both of you the significance of the detail work of the commission.

In passing, I want to say to the Senator from Texas that I am going to miss him greatly. He has been a companionable, sweet, and fine friend, a useful Senator, and we are going to miss him very much indeed when he leaves the Senate. We have no doubt that the changes of time will land him in the governor's chair, if they do not bring him back to the Senate itself; but, wherever he goes he takes the good wishes of his colleagues.

Mr. Caldwell was speaking about what these men have to put up with. He said:

If you could only drop in at the commission's offices in Washington and observe the daily routine of work, I am sure that you would express your heartfelt sympathy for its members. They are all able men of high integrity, working longer hours, I think, than any other tribunal in Washington, and facing more baffling problems.

I am in the fullest accord with that. I think these men—Judge Robinson and Commissioner Sykes and Commissioner Caldwell and Mr. Lafount and these other men upon the commission—have done wonderful work. They have devoted themselves to the cause of the public.

To quote again from Mr. Caldwell, he says:

A hearing took place last week which is a noteworthy example of what the commission has to face at these hearings. An Oklahoma station applied for the channel which has heretofore been used by two Louisiana stations. One of these stations introduced into evidence 170,000 affidavits in its support. Senators and Congressmen and other men holding public office testified in substantial numbers on both sides. One of the States was represented through its attorney general. My resignation has come just in time to enable me to avoid reading the 170,000 affidavits and I am passing the job on to my successor.

That is an example of the detail work which has to be done by a very limited number of persons in this commission.

Last fall in connection with the new allocation, many stations suffered a cut in time. One such station sent in 400,000 letters from the listening public.

Think of it, Mr. President—400,000 letters!

At times the mail is flooded against certain kinds of advertising, and yet when the commission proceeds to take disciplinary measures against a station that has apparently been engaged in improper use of its privileges then there is a flood of letters the other way. There are letters protesting against too much duplication of chain programs.

This is very interesting. I am sure you will find it so, because of the debates which have taken place regarding the chain programs.

I quote again from Mr. Caldwell:

And yet whenever the commission has attempted to cut the time of such a station a torrent of abuse descends upon it. Among the miscellaneous mail which daily reaches the commission officers, some of it addressed to me as general counsel of the commission, are many inquiries as to what is the best receiving set, many inquiries as to how to build a receiving set, many complaints insisting that the commission do this or that with regard to local interference from electric ice boxes, dentists' machines, power plants, and the like, and such matters over which the commission has, naturally, no power or jurisdiction.

It may or may not surprise you, however, to know that broadcasting stations are only one of the commission's problems, and perhaps not the most important at that. Your receiving set, if it is one of the usual kind, is built so that it takes in only the wave lengths or channels that are in what we call the broadcast band. There are 96 of these channels. If your set covered a wider range, and you should be able to turn the dial either above its present high point or below its present low point, what would you find? In one direction you would run into what is known as the low frequency or long wave band, in which there are about 1,000 separate channels wide enough for wireless telegraphy. The first channels you would turn are used by ships chiefly, and one channel in particular is the international distress call channel. There are channels used by airplanes, and by stations which give services enabling either ships or airplanes to get information about their bearings and directions. Then come Government stations in large numbers, and channels that are used for wireless communication across the ocean, both telegraph and telephone.

Then if you should turn the dial the other way you enter the high-frequency or short-wave band where there are at present about 1,260 channels available for practical use. This is newly discovered territory in radio.

This is an interesting thing; and those who read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD I believe will find it worth their attention.

I quote:

The short waves used to be thought fit for nothing but use by amateurs. But within the last two years our laboratories and the amateurs have shown that they are tremendously valuable, particularly for long-distance communication. These waves have a peculiar habit of taking a long jump before coming to earth in a way so as to be satisfactorily received. The shorter the wave the longer the jump, so that when you get to waves below 50 meters the jump is sufficient to make the waves suitable for communication across the Atlantic and even the Pacific Ocean, with comparatively little power. In the short-wave or high-frequency band, there are many channels given over to ships and airplanes, many to amateurs, and for experimentation. Some channels are being used for exploration for oil. Some are being reserved for television which is only just barely emerging from the laboratory and may have emerged too soon. One company has established wireless connections with 30 different other countries in the world.

I want to tell you about that. Sometime when you are in New York, go down on Broad Street, away down in the financial district; go down in the evening when there is no travel there, because all the people who congest that section of the city in the daytime have gone to their homes in the country; but down there is the station where international messages are received and sent.

I was there with a committee of gentlemen some weeks or months ago; and it was the most uncanny thing in the world to listen to messages coming in from London and Paris and Brussels and Berlin, from Rome, from Athens, from Constantinople, from Alexandria, from Jerusalem, from the Orient, from China and Japan, and from Australia—messages coming from every part of the world. Why, what is being accomplished by the radio is the most amazing thing. This great invention, which has done so much for the happiness and convenience and safety of the human family, must be safeguarded.

I want to say that one further reason why I am insistent upon the defeat of this bill is because, in my humble opinion, the problems are so great from an international standpoint that the President of the United States should have his eye upon what is going on in radio. These waves can not be confined to this country. While they are inventing now a sort of reflector, which, in a certain sense, keeps the waves going in one direction, yet, in the nature of things, the whole world is covered; every country of the world is reached by these waves; and so we have great international problems—the division of wave lengths with other countries. It is not a thing that we can settle ourselves. We must consult the other nations of the earth; and the only way in the world that that can be done, so far as I can see, from the American standpoint, is that in one of the executive departments under the President of the United States there shall be supervision of the details of this work.

It was a very wise suggestion that Mr. Hoover made, in his appearance before the committee in 1926 or 1927, when he suggested the wisdom of having the administrative side in the Department of Commerce, with an appeal board such as we have provided for in the law; but we can never hope to solve the problems of radio unless we take into consideration the rights and the privileges of the other nations of the world, and in the problem of the short waves of which I have told you we have a problem which reaches to every locality on the face of the earth.

There can be sent out from this city these waves which will traverse the ether and be received in every square mile of the earth's surface. It is an amazing thing—an amazing thing.

Yet there are men in the United States Senate who are seeking to have us ruin the enterprise by turning it over for a few months at a time to a radio commission, when we ought to have one made up of the strongest men in the United States, with legal talent and technical advice and assistants, so that they can solve problems, and solve them to the advantage of our country.

I think, having spoken the second time upon this first amendment, as far as I am concerned I am content to have the amendment go to a vote.

ENTRY OF CERTAIN ALIENS TO THE UNITED STATES—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. JOHNSON submitted the following report, which was ordered to lie on the table:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 5094) making it a felony with penalty for certain aliens to enter the United States of America under certain conditions in violation of law, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the House amendment insert the following:

"That (a) if any alien has been arrested and deported in pursuance of law, he shall be excluded from admission to the United States whether such deportation took place before or after the enactment of this act, and if he enters or attempts to enter the United States after the expiration of 60 days after the enactment of this act, he shall be guilty of a felony and upon conviction thereof shall, unless a different penalty is otherwise expressly provided by law, be punished by imprisonment for not more than two years or by a fine of not more than $1,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

"(b) For the purposes of this section any alien ordered deported (whether before or after the enactment of this act) who has left the United States shall be considered to have been deported in pursuance of law, irrespective of the source from which the expenses of his transportation were defrayed or of the place to which he departed.

(c) An alien subject to exclusion from admission to the United States under this section who is employed upon a vessel arriving in the United States shall not be entitled to any of the landing privileges allowed by law to seamen.

(d) So much of section 3 of the immigration act of 1917 (U. S. C. title 8, sec. 136 (j)) as reads as follows: "persons who have been deported under any of the provisions of this act, and who may again seek admission within one year from the date of such deportation, unless prior to their reembarkation at a foreign port or their attempt to be admitted from foreign contiguous territory, the Secretary of Labor shall have consented to their reapplying for admission" is amended to read as follows: "persons who have been excluded from admission and deported in pursuance of law, and who may again seek admission within one year from the date of such deportation, unless prior to their reembarkation at a place outside the United States or their attempt to be admitted from foreign contiguous territory the Secretary of Labor has consented to their reapplying for admission."

(e) So much of section 18 of the immigration act of 1917 (U. S. C. title 8, sec. 154) as reads as follows: "or knowingly to bring to the United States at any time within one year from the date of deportation any alien rejected or arrested and deported under any provision of this act, unless prior to reembarkation the Secretary of Labor has consented that such alien shall reapply for admission, as required by section 3 hereof" is amended to read as follows: "or knowingly to bring to the United States any alien excluded or arrested and deported under any provision of law until such time as such alien may be lawfully entitled to reapply for admission to the United States." The amendment made by this subsection shall take effect on the expiration of 60 days after the enactment of this act, but the provision amended shall remain in force for the collection of any fine incurred before the effective date of such amendment.

"SEC. 2. Any alien who hereafter enters the United States at any time or place other than as designated by immigration officials, or eludes examination or inspection by immigration officials, or obtains entry to the United States by a willfully false or misleading representation or the willful concealment of a material fact, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and, upon conviction, shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year or by a fine of not more than $1,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

"SEC. 3. An alien sentenced to imprisonment shall not be deported under any provision of law until after the termination of the imprisonment. For the purposes of this section the imprisonment shall be considered as terminated upon the release of the alien from confinement, whether or not he is subject to rearrest or further confinement in respect of the same offense.

"SEC. 4. Upon the final conviction of any alien of any offense under this act in any court of record it shall be the duty of the clerk of the court to notify the Secretary of Labor, giving the name of the alien convicted, the nature of the offense of which convicted, the sentence imposed, and, if imprisoned, the place of imprisonment, and, if known, the place of birth of such alien, his nationality, and the time when and place where he entered the United States.

"SEC. 5. Terms defined in the immigration act of 1924 shall, when used in this act, have the meaning assigned to such terms in that act."

And the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendment to the title of the bill.

FEDERAL RADIO COMMISSION

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15430) continuing the powers and authority of the Federal Radio Commission under the radio act of 1927, and for other purposes.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, a while ago, while the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] was delivering his address, I interrupted him for the purpose of asking a question, and in order to ask that question intelligently I had to make a statement. The then occupant of the chair ruled that when the Senator from New York yielded the floor for the purpose of allowing that question to be asked, he thereby yielded the floor. I differed from that opinion of the Chair, which was appealed from, and when it was appealed from, a majority of the Senate sustained the Chair.

If everything moves along nicely, as I hope it will, I will have two more years to serve in this very distinguished body; and I want to keep that precedent before the Senate, because it may be very useful.

The question I wanted to ask the Senator from New York I shall ask now. On the 4th of March those who have the privilege of sitting in the Senate and in the galleries will hear the announcement, "The President of the United States." Mr. Coolidge will come in—a man who, in my opinion, in many respects has been a great President. I do not think he has measured up to Theodore Roosevelt. In some respects I do not think he has measured up to one of the best men who ever lived who occupied the White House—William McKinley. I wish I could have been standing right behind that fellow when he attempted to assassinate Mr. McKinley.

I would have liked to cut his head plumb off his shoulders, and taken some of his blood back down to my State and spread it around in order that the bloodhounds might smell it, the meanest smell that could possibly have been given to a dog.

Then there will be announced, "The Vice President of the United States." The genial, pleasant, very able, and very distinguished gentleman who occupies that position now will be in the Senate, a man of wonderful genius and splendid character.

I do not believe there is a man in the Senate, either Democrat or Republican, or quasi Democrat or Republican, or Progressive, but will regret to see Charles G. Dawes give up that office, notwithstanding the fact that it is to be occupied by a man who is loved by every man in the Senate, and who I believe in many respects will command more influence and more respect as the Presiding Officer of the Senate than any man who has ever sat in that chair. While he in politics is a Republican, for four years in my experience here I have never seen him do one act or say one word but what was fair, conscientious, honest, and clean.

Then they will announce the Cabinet, and the Cabinet are supposed to march in. As I understand the Constitution of the United States, in the case of the death of the President and Vice President the Secretary of State would be President, although I understand that my good personal friend Senator MOSES will be President for a short time between 12 o'clock on March 3, which is the Sabbath, and 12 o'clock on March 4.

Then they will announce, "The Chief Justice of the United States and the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States." Everybody knows what I think of the Chief Justice of the United States. If they do not believe I think a good deal of him, they can just look at the calendar and see how many judgeships have been created since he called around to my office.

Mr. DILL. Including the judgeship the Senator wanted.

Mr. BLEASE. Yes; the judge has not been appointed yet, but I hope to get him appointed pretty soon.

The Senators elect will be here. Then the Members of the House of Representatives will come over, and there will be assembled in this little bit of a small Chamber the entire Government of the United States of America. I think it is a mistake, though it may be none of my business. My friend the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] suggests that the diplomatic corps will be here. I am not very much worried about them, as long as they let them drink liquor and do not let me have any.

Think of it. Some fellow might slip up to one of these doors, or up in the press gallery, as the newspaper men do sometimes when they want to hear what is going on in executive session, and drop a bomb down here on this floor and blow the whole American Government up at one time. I do not know whether many people have ever thought about the seriousness of that situation or not.

It may be considered that we are guarded. It is said there are guards up there. They have a man up there, who sits over at one door, who looks like Gen. John A. Logan. I call him General Logan. I love every one of them. They sit all around up there. I know a 14-year old boy who could go up there and whip any four doorkeepers up there in three minutes, and throw every one of them down here on this floor just like rag dolls. But they say we are protected, and possibly we are. I do not say we are not.

Now they want to put a radio back here right behind me so as to broadcast what is going on in the Senate. I do not know anything about radios; I never listened to one of them in my life. I am supposed to be speaking on the radio bill, as the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. MAYFIELD] suggests. I do not know what they might do, and that is what I want to ask Senators. They might fill that thing up with gas, some deadly gas, and just about the time the crowd assembled in this Chamber, everybody in control of the Government of the United States, some fellow might turn on a machine down here and just gas out the whole business.

That is what I wanted to ask the Senator from New York, and that is what the Chair ruled on, not the present occupant [the Vice President in the chair]. I do not believe he would have ruled that if a Senator rose and asked the Senator from New York a question, he would lose the floor. Some people laughed, I suppose, thinking that was a pretty good idea, but the Senator did not object, it was all right.

I do not consider that the making of a statement by a Senator in order to make intelligent a question he desires to ask is enough to deprive a Senator of the floor. But I want the precedent which was established to-night to be remembered.

I do not care very much about the radio bill. I will be honest about it. I am opposed to it. I was the only man who voted against it when it came up. I have rather peculiar ideas, I guess, and perhaps a lot of people think they are fool ideas. I suppose some would put a "d" in front of that word to better express the kind of ideas they think I have. But to save my life I can not see what right we have to control the air that God Almighty gave the people.

Right here on the main street in this city, where are the poor folks going to see the inaugural parade. I get up in the morning and look out of the window of my room at the Washington Hotel, and I can not see room enough on the sidewalks for people to walk. Everything on the Government grounds is covered, the Treasury Department space is all covered, there is not a sidewalk left, they are all clogged up, and the seats are $7.50 apiece. You may come on down to the Post Office Department and find it all blocked up; the Municipal Building is all blocked up, and it is just that way all the way down Pennsylvania Avenue. I would like to have somebody tell me where they expect the poor white folks and the niggers to stand on inauguration day. They ought to have some privileges. God knows they ought to be allowed the freedom of the streets. But if they go out in the streets the police will rush out and knock them to one side and say, "Get out of the way of the parade." If they get on the sidewalk, the people up there will say, "That fellow is in front of me. I paid $7.50 for my seat," and they will knock him out of the way.

Now, in the Senate it is said we are going to control the air. The Government already has control of fish, the sidewalks, the birds, the trees, they have already taken the Atlantic Ocean and the Pacific Ocean. Now, they come here and say, "We are going to take the air away from the people. Let no man breathe air unless he gets a license from the Radio Commission."

I do not blame the Republican Party; I want to be understood. If I could have had the radio last summer and worked it as they did, I do not believe I could have elected Al Smith, but if I had had a good, honest-to-God Democrat, I could have elected him.

I was surprised this afternoon to hear a certain Senator bragging about this Radio Commission.

The candidate for Vice President on the Democratic ticket came to my city, a little place of only 60,000 inhabitants, all Democrats. He did not have any business coming down there. I told him he was wasting his time. Hoover only got 5,000 votes in my whole State. I do not know whether he would have got that many if Joe Tolbert had not been told they were planning to cut down his representation in the National Republican Convention. We did not want him to have it cut down so we got Joe 5,000 votes to keep up his credit. [Laughter.]

They charged, as I understand it, $3,000 for JOE ROBINSON to make that speech in Columbia, S. C. He never made a vote for the Democratic Party. He never made a vote for the Republican Party. Why such an exorbitant price, such an outrageous price, for a man to make a speech over the radio? As I said the other day, I do not want to make any speech over the radio; I do not want to talk to any audience I can not see. A negro preacher down home said he "didn't want to talk to no audience he couldn't take up a collection from." [Laughter.] I do not want to talk to any audience I can not see.

We all know that the Republican Party under the present radio law and Radio Commission had every advantage that it is possible for the commission to give to put their speakers on the radio. Motion-picture shows did the same thing.

I have seen a lot of pictures up here worn out from being shown for the purpose of intimidating the voters of this country. Other pictures were brought out displaying certain things. The whole system of radio and the whole system of moving-picture shows and the whole editorial columns of certain papers were bought, regardless of sympathies and regardless of price, and paid for by the Republican Party. They know it and I know it. The honest-to-God man in this country who is at home working to-night has very few representatives in this body or in the body at the other end of the Capitol. The money power of the country has got control of it all. You know it, Senators, and your Congressmen know it and your President knows it.

We have in our country to-night thousands of women and children who are going to bed hungry, thousands of them. We have right here in the city of Washington men and women committing suicide, out of work, American citizens, and yet we are bringing into this country every day thousands of foreigners to do work that should be going to American citizens. What is the purpose? It is time for these little societies—I will not designate them—which go around here writing letters to Senators about legislation and talking about the D. A. R.'s and "original origins" and other propositions like that, to stop that line of activity and consider how long it is going to be before the foreign element in this country will outvote the American-born citizens.

Take some of the States—I will not call their names but Senators know them. Right now the Democrats do not control them. The Republicans do not control them. The foreign elements of those States control them. People are being brought in here that control them. A son is born to one of you Senators and a daughter is born to one of you. It takes 21 long years of life in America for either one of them to become a voter—21 years, and long years, too, for an American boy to be able to vote for a President of the United States or for a United States Senator or a Congressman.

But what about the foreigner? He is dragged over here from Italy, England, Germany, and all the other countries, and while your boy and your girl will have to grow for 21 years before they can have the privilege of voting for the President of this great Nation, that foreigner will come over here and in just a few years he will cast his ballot, while your boy and your girl have been waiting for 18 or 19 years and are still deprived of the right to vote. How long are you going to let that go on, you people in the galleries? You are too particular about hurting somebody's feelings.

I went up into one of the departments the other day. I hardly ever go to them. I have been in two since I have been in Washington. I have had people write and ask me to go there and I tell them "No." I did not come here to be a lobbyist or a lackey or a messenger boy running to the departments asking for favors. I do not want any favors. I want to attend to my own business. But I did go up there on this occasion. I saw men and women sitting in their offices, with their typewriters covered up, reading newspapers and smoking cigarettes and not doing a bit of work; yet they will run down to the committees of Congress and say, "We are worked to death. Can not you raise our salaries a little bit?" Half of them ought to be turned out and the other half ought to be made to work. But it is all right; the Republican Party has to have votes, so why not create jobs for pets and let the pets loaf and vote on election day? I do not blame them. Go ahead. [Laughter.]

But these are facts and we can not get away from them. Then Senators come here and say "we do not want certain bills passed because they will do so and so; we want other bills passed because they will do so and so." Why do not these societies go to work and advocate or disapprove of the things that will help this country or will ruin this country?

You know as well as I do, Mr. President and gentlemen of the Senate, that the foreign element is driving from our cities and our States our people who are entitled to the positions which the foreigners are getting. I am not speaking for South Carolina, God bless her. She has the purest, unmixed American blood in the United States. We have very few of this element I speak of in my State and I think it will be a long time before we have too many of them. It does not take them long when they get down there to find that they have a very unwholesome and unwelcome home. We tell them in such a way that they know it. If they do not learn it by words then we teach them in some other way. We let them know we do not want them.

I am speaking for this great Nation that I help to represent in this body. Take the colored race. I have been held up as one of their bitterest enemies notwithstanding the fact that when I was governor of my State I pardoned more of them than every other governor we have ever had all put together. The bootblack shop belongs to the colored man. The barber shop belongs to the colored man in certain respects. The shoveler's job belongs in certain respects to the colored man. What are you northern people going to do with the colored man? Thank God he is leaving us and coming to you. The more he comes the better we like it. You drive them out of every profession and business and then a man comes to you and says, "Are you shaving down here at a certain negro shop?" "Yes, I shave down there." "If you don't quit shaving down there we will not vote for you." "Do you go over to a certain shoe-shining parlor run by colored people and have your shoes shined?" "Yes." "If you do not quit that we will not vote for you."

In other lines of business and menial labor this foreign elemen is driving out the colored men. I have no apologies for them. They are driving them out of the trades that God Almighty intended them to be in, and in order to make a living many of them are stealing and committing all kinds of crimes when, if they were not driven out by this foreign element, but allowed to hold their jobs that God Almighty intended for them to hold, they would be making a good living and getting along all right.

I warn you Senators from States north of the Potomac River that this is a question you have got to settle. The South has settled it. It is getting to be a serious proposition with you, too. In Illinois they have a serious situation—and you Republicans have it, too. You have a serious proposition facing you when this negro is brought here to be sworn in on the 4th of March. You may think it is a laughable matter, but you will find it is a very serious matter. Mr. Hoover has a very serious problem in that matter, too. He may say to old North Carolina and Virginia, "I will turn out the negroes of the South and I will put in white people"; but remember when he does it that Pennsylvania has a few negroes; Illinois has a few; Ohio has a few; and other States have a few negroes. West Virginia has a good many negroes. When he slaps the negro of the South in the face that fact must be remembered. If he slaps the negro of those States in the face, then you will find it is your problem and not the problem of the Confederate States of the American Union.

Mr. President, we could correct those evils. We could correct them by stopping this foreign population from coming in. In my own State we have very little of it. They have run the white people out of the restaurant business. The Greeks are running it, and some of them are mighty good people. Some of them are my clients. Some of them are friends of mine. I know several in my town that I would loan the last dollar I have, because I know I would get it back. They are nice people; they are all right.

Take other occupations, such as the fruit business. Who is selling the fruit? The Italians. They have driven American citizens out of the business. In the departments right here in Washington there are people working and drawing good salaries who are not American citizens, while American citizens are idling on the streets and asking for work. Senators, that is not right; it should be corrected. An American-born boy or an American-born girl should first be offered the position. If we can not find an American boy or an American girl to take it, then give it to the foreigner, but the Americans are entitled to the first choice. It is not right to discriminate as we now discriminate.

Mr. President, when first I came to the Senate I did not know anybody here. I got up and made a little speech. In that speech I referred to a man who was dead. I did not say a word about that man that I had not said in his lifetime; I did not say a word about him but what I had said when I knew that spies sent by him and his henchmen—and I use the word "henchmen" advisedly—were trailing me all over South Carolina trying to find some excuse to put me in jail. They watched my home at night; they took note of every man who came there, every visitor, and everyone who went out. They did not think I knew it, but I did. They followed me when I would go to make a speech; they had stenographers to take down what I said. Night after night, when I would go home and go to bed, they would have spies standing outside of my home and around my yard watching me, to see if I held conferences there.

There was not anything for them to get. I was glad they watched me. I have never done anything in my life—not a thing—that I would not be willing to have shown on the screen of any picture show in America.

I have never been hunting in my life; I have never been fishing in my life; I have never played baseball nor football; I have never had time to do so. I have never gambled a cent in my life. I used to ride horse races, but I got somebody else to bet for me when I was on the horse; but there is not one thing in this world in my private or public life that I have ever done that I would be afraid to have shown on any picture screen in America, provided, as I have stated, those who might have been present were protected.

There has not been a word that I have ever said that I would not be willing to see printed in the newspapers; for my father told me when I was a little boy never to put my name to anything unless I was willing to see it published in a newspaper.

I started a poor boy without very much influence; I passed through several offices into the Senate, thank God and the honest laboring people of South Carolina; and I might add, possibly, a few thanks to a lying press and the preachers—

> Who stole the livery of the court of Heaven,
> To serve the devil in.

Oh, but there was a great deal said. One Senator who is dead and gone, who sat right over there [indicating]—I hope he is in Heaven; I have no reason to believe he is not—got very much excited about what I said. Another Senator ran in here and said something about the vultures tearing the bowels out of Prometheus. Well, I took it all; I said nothing. I was a young man up here then.

Mr. President, Robert Lansing died the other day, and let us consider for a moment what some people said about him after he was dead and when he could not answer. The man of whom I spoke was living; he was the President of these United States of America, and he could answer what I said. Therefore, I said nothing about any man who is dead, but what I had said about the man living and in the pride of his power. I have got the same respect for him now that I had for him when he was living, and my friends in South Carolina know what that respect is.

Now, what says the State, of Columbia, S. C., on Friday morning, November 2, 1928? I read as follows:

[From the State, Columbia, S. C., Friday morning, November 2, 1928]

THE STATESMAN ON PAPER

How are heroes made?

Political ones can be manufactured by "talk." Let a few newspapers with large circulations and a few magazines that are read throughout the country "get behind" any man and what a wonderful reputation they can build for him. It may be all "paper stuff"—special articles at so much a word by this and that writer, cartoons and laudatory editorials, but if continued long enough the public, made up in large measure by those who are anything but analytical, comes to accept the propaganda as truth. It is so much easier to swallow soft stuff than to chew and digest facts. It is by such process that a halo was made to surround Mr. Coolidge—a silent person with quite a treasure of common sense in his make-up, and that common sense being nowhere more markedly displayed than in talking little and moving with the sedateness counseled by extreme caution.

We have before us one of the New York Tribune's syndicated cartoons pretending to present a Smith-Hoover "balance sheet." As a sample of first-rate bunk handed the public this is a fine illustration. For "native ability" Smith and Hoover are credited with 100 each. But if the cartoonist were required to show where Mr. Hoover has one-fourth the "native ability" of Mr. Smith, how could he do so? On "Making the Best of Opportunities" each is credited with 100. Yet Hoover started out with a first-rate college education, and Smith had to go to work selling newspapers when 12 years old to help support a mother and brothers and sisters—and he has made New York a great governor and is his party's candidate for the Presidency!

But yet more ridiculously unfair and unsustainable are the relative credits for "Self Education." Smith is given 75 and Hoover 1,000! Were the figures reversed they would be far nearer the truth. For "Record of Achievement" Smith is given "(local) 10" and Hoover "(world) 1,000." What "world" achievement of his own can be credited to Mr. Hoover? And if Mr. Smith is not entitled to a rating of 1,000 instead of 10 for his achievements that Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler and Charles Evans Hughes grossly falsified conditions and grossly deceived the American people when they, eminent citizens and conspicuous Republicans, gave Smith the highest praise that could be bestowed for his achievements in government.

"National Experience"—whatever that may mean—comes next. Smith is allowed 1½ and Hoover 1,000. Smith has had far more national experience as Governor of New York than that of either Coolidge, Wilson, or Roosevelt had when elected to the Presidency. And at what point has Hoover's experience ever touched government? His "experience" is such that when those at his elbow in the Harding administration were laying plans to steal the earth and all that is in it, he didnt smell either oil or rats; didnt know what it was all about.

On "world knowledge" Smith is given zero and Hoover 1,000. Hoover's "world knowledge" has been largely confined to engineering projects, especially in mining. He has had no experience in government or diplomacy. He has never demonstrated ability to handle men, to bend them to his ideas; his dealings, when acting for this Government, were the dealings of an autocrat. He held all the power and the money the American people put at his command. On the other hand, Smith has the knowledge of human beings; the understanding of men.

For "business experience" Smith is credited with nothing and Hoover with 1,000. Yet the "business" of running a great government like that of the State of New York for many years gives an incomparably more valuable experience for a President of the United States than the business experience of trading for mining interests or running our Department of Commerce. Ten thousand men in business in this country are successfully performing the same sort of work.

Mr. Hoover may have the makings of a great President—and the ability to win and lead strong men in a most important part of such equipment—but such has not been proved. If he has great progressive ideas and great courage to press them, he has revealed neither to the American people. The laurels accorded him as statesman of heroic stature are, so far, "paper made."

Mr. President, I particularly want to call attention to the statement in the beginning of this article that the newspapers of this country, the boast being made by the editor of one of them, can make or ruin any man they please.

Mr. President, I will cut my remarks short in accordance with some information I have received. Before concluding, however, I ask unanimous consent to have published in the RECORD along with my remarks an article from the New Leader, of New York, of December 29, 1928, in reference to certain correspondence between Secretary Bryan and Ambassador Page in London.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article referred to is as follows:

[The New Leader, New York, December 29, 1928]

Publication by the State Department of certain official correspondence in the year 1915 lets a few secrets out of the bag. One of the most valuable documents is a cable to Secretary Bryan of May 8 from Ambassador Page in London, who reports confidential information he had received from the political editor of the London Times regarding the secret bargain made by England, France, and Russia with Italy to bring the latter into the war. The consideration was Italian annexation of Austrian territory, including many Serbs. Of course, the bargain was unknown to Serbia.

Woodrow Wilson always insisted that he knew nothing of the secret bargains of the Allies till he arrived in Paris, but here is evidence that his ambassador to England reported one of the bargains to his Secretary of State in 1915, the year in which the bargain was made! Are we required to still believe that Wilson was ignorant of these secret treaties?

The more we learn of the inner history of the "war for democracy," the more we are convinced that it was a crime against humanity.

Mr. BLEASE. I also ask to have published in the RECORD along with my remarks an article from the New Leader, of New York, of December 29, 1928, entitled "Lansing Called Britain 'Inhuman' and 'Repugnant.'"

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article referred to is as follows:

[The New Leader, New York, December 29, 1928]

LANSING CALLED BRITAIN "INHUMAN" AND "REPUGNANT"

The curtain is lifted a bit higher on the diplomatic machinations which eventually led the United States into the World War and the sacrifice of 120,000 American lives in a "war to end war." Several years behind the foreign offices of Germany, Russia, England, and Austria, the United States Government at last is publishing "diplomatic papers" dealing with the World War. Like the series of papers issued by England and France, and like those dishonest books issued by Germany and Russia and France in the earlier of the postwar years, the American Papers Relating to the Foreign Relations of the United States, World War supplements, carry with them no assurance that the documents presented were not "selected" or "edited" to please the war-makers' sensibilities.

The 1915 supplement to the foreign-relations papers, issued this week by the State Department in Washington, offer sufficient material, however, to uphold the position of the Socialists and others who opposed entrance into the war by the United States. The charge made by so eminent a historian as Charles A. Beard that the Wilson administration did not exercise as firm a hand against British "atrocities" and violations of American rights on the seas as it did finally against German activities is substantiated by none other than Robert Lansing, Wilson's Secretary of State during the war period.

Robert Lansing, while counsel to the State Department, made a memorandum on a conversation he had with Sir Cecil Spring-Rice, then British ambassador to the United States. In this memorandum Lansing expressed himself firmly against the British policy of trying to starve the civilian population of Germany. This policy Lansing termed "inhuman" and "repugnant." He urged the British Government to discontinue its food blockade.

This memorandum reads:

WASHINGTON, May 27, 1915.

In a conversation which I had this afternoon at the department with Sir Cecil Spring-Rice I said to him that information received from many sources indicated that Germany was not suffering from lack of food, but on the contrary had sufficient to last until the harvest, and that after that there would be a great abundance, as all arable land had been planted with grain and other food crops.

I asked him why, in view of this fact, his Government should be so determined to keep foodstuffs out of Germany. I said, "You admit that you can not starve Germany by interrupting food and imports, and yet you continue your efforts to stop the trade and lay yourself open to the charge of inhumanity by attempting to reduce Germany by starvation."

He replied that what I said was true, but that knowledge of Germany's food supply had been only recently obtained by his government.

I asked him if, knowing the facts and the futility of their "starvation policy," it would not be a wise course for his government to accede to the proposal, which was made some time ago, that Great Britain would permit foodstuffs to go to the civil population provided Germany would cease her submarine warfare on merchant ships.

I pointed out to him that the idea of starving men, women, and children seemed to many people as inhuman as drowning them; that the legality of the attempt was neither here nor there, since the very idea was repugnant to the humane sentiments of modern society; that the attempt offered a more or less plausible excuse for Germany's sinking of unarmed merchantmen, and that Germany was, as he knew, using this excuse with considerable effect.

The ambassador replied that what I said was convicting; that he knew that the purpose of starving the German people had made a bad impression in this country, although we had done the same thing in our Civil War, and that the Germans asserted that their submarine warfare was only retaliatory.

I asked him, "Why, then, does not your Government relieve themselves of the odium of pursuing an inhuman policy by agreeing to allow food to go to the civil population of Germany? You have nothing to lose, because you admit you can not starve the nation into submission, and you have much to gain, because you will put Germany in the position of having to stop her submarine attacks or else bear alone the stigma of being cruel and inhuman. Whichever way the German Government decides, Great Britain would seem to be the gainer. I do not suggest this course on humanitarian grounds, but solely on the ground of expediency. It seems to me the politic thing for your Government to do."

He replied with marked emphasis, "You are entirely right. It would be the very best course my Government would take, and would put Germany in a serious dilemma. I shall suggest it to Sir Edward Grey and urge its adoption."

I said to him that if he proposed to his Government to take that action I earnestly hoped that he would not mention having had any conversation with me on the subject, that he must understand I had spoken confidentially and personally, and that to have anyone in the department making, even unofficially, such a suggestion, and especially advancing argument in its favor from the British standpoint, would be most embarrassing.

The ambassador replied that he understood my position and would promise that our conversation would be treated as secret and not mentioned in any way. He added, "The suggestion will be my own, and so will the arguments in its favor. I will not mention your name or your Government in connection with the subject."

He spoke again of the tactical benefit to his Government if the course proposed should be adopted, and of the favorable effect which he knew it would have on public opinion in this country.

He left me with the impression that he was heartily in favor of the suggestion and would do all that he could to have his Government adopt it.

ROBERT LANSING.

Lansing, as he admits, did not make these suggestions to Britain because of his "humanitarianism." It was "expediency" he was interested in. He suggested that his plan would put Germany into a hole. He thus revealed a partiality to Britain long before his country had entered the war against Germany. In the light of this partiality it is easy to understand why he was so anxious to conceal his part of the conversation with Spring-Rice.

Despite Lansing's strong characterization of England's war-time tactics, he, like Wilson, who is reported to have expressed similar views before he decided to enter the "war for democracy," within a year had conciliated themselves to the idea of fighting side by side with this nation which used "inhuman" and "repugnant" means. Spring-Rice had given the impression that he would do all he could to have his Government adopt Lansing's suggestions. He failed. England preferred to give her small army of propagandists in the United States and the interests of American holders of British bonds more time to whip up a war spirit here.

Sensational and sordid is the story of war-time intrigue by the great military powers to secure the support of Italy, Bulgaria, and Rumania in the year 1915, as related by official dispatches and correspondence just made public by the State Department. Incidental to the purchase of Italy and Rumania by the Allies and the buying of Bulgarian support by the Central Powers is a revelation of the strictly business attitude taken by the Wilson administration toward the conflict at that period. The Lusitania sinking and the stopping of American cargoes by the British fleet caused endless protest from Washington, which was not at all concerned with the rights of small nationalities or the right of self-determination.

Ambassador Walter Hines Page, in a cable to Secretary Bryan, May 8, 1915, reports a confidential disclosure made to him by the political editor of the London Times, that "England, France, and Russia made a bargain with Italy April 30, agreeing to cede to Italy very large parts of Austria, some of which has a Slavic population, if Italy comes into the war within a month. This was done without consulting Serbia and against her wishes. Italy will soon come in if she keeps her agreement, to be followed by Rumania. I have heard unofficial confirmation of this agreement here."

Minister Charles Vopicka, at Bucharest, October 19, 1915, reported to Secretary Lansing that the Rumanian King was trying to prevent Rumania from going into the war for the Allies "against Bulgaria." He added that "there is a scheme on foot to sell to Germany at fancy prices the whole of Rumania's crop through an economic society which was formed here a few days ago—of course, for the consideration that the members of the society, which would mean more or less all Rumanian landowners, would favor Germany."

On October 27, Vopicka reported a detailed plan he had made earlier for the Allies to get Bulgaria's support by pledging to Serbia enough of Austria's territory to lure Bulgaria into a similar deal for Macedonia. But it was Germany and Austria who bid highest for the Bulgarian armies.

Mr. BLEASE. I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks an article from the Evening Star of Washington, D. C., of the issue of Tuesday, November 20, 1928, entitled "Lansing memory paid high tribute."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is ordered.

The article referred to is as follows:

[From the Evening Star, Washington, D. C., Tuesday, November 20, 1928]

LANSING MEMORY PAID HIGH TRIBUTE—JAMES M. BECK AND OTHERS PRAISE HIM AS "PERFECT GENTLEMAN"

A high tribute to the memory of Robert Lansing was paid yesterday at the twenty-seventh annual meeting of the Archæological Society of Washington, held at the residence of Mrs. Henry F. Dimock, 1301 Sixteenth Street, by JAMES M. BECK, who succeeded Mr. Lansing as president of the organization at the late president's request, and by other notables.

Mr. BECK, who was inducted into office with Irwin B. Laughlin, former Minister to Greece, in the chair, declared that Mr. Lansing was "the scholar in politics, a type of statesman of which our country stands in sore need."

"Robert Lansing was not merely a good lawyer and an able Secretary of State," Mr. BECK asserted, "but he was always a gentleman in the truest and noblest sense of that word, and a gentleman he remained to the end. I believe it could be said of him, as truly as it could be said of any public man of whom I have any knowledge, that he never did an unjust thing or uttered an inconsiderate word or harbored an ungenerous thought."

SIR ESME SPEAKS

Sir Esme Howard, British Ambassador and dean of the diplomatic corps, paying a tribute to Mr. Lansing, recalled that he had met him in Paris in 1918 and 1919 during the conference that led up to the peace of Versailles.

"It was easy to recognize in him at once a man of cultivated mind and wide reading, of great charm of manner, and of readiness—that most important qualification for a diplomatist—to listen to the other side," Sir Esme told the society—"a man who did not allow himself to be swayed by prejudices or by gusts of emotion, but one who, while always upholding the interests of his country, could yet keep a judicial attitude toward all the most difficult and complicated questions of that time as they arose. He was always courteous but firm in his dealings with others, and his quiet, judicial handling of all questions was, I believe I may say, universally appreciated."

JUSSERAND PAYS TRIBUTE

Arthur Stanley Riggs, director and secretary of the society, read this brief message of tribute from former Ambassador Jules Jusserand of France, a life member of the society:

"Our hearts ache at the news that Robert Lansing is no more. His youthful appearance, his lucidity of mind, his ever-active pen seemed to promise years and years of useful life.

"I mourn a friend of many days, one ever to be trusted, in stormy times or calm, a level-headed man if ever there was one, bent on duty, whatever the consequences, and following the dictates of his conscience with no trace of ostentation, doing what he considered right as the most natural thing in the world, simply because he thought it right.

"Deeply concerned in general problems and questions of principle, he was a thinker and a sage.

"Wisdom was the characteristic of his advice; those who were chiefly struck by his quiet tones did not always notice how firm that advice could be and did not remark the subdued, never bitter, humor that flavored his judgments.

"His loss is a grievous one for all those who knew him; it is a grievous loss for the Republic."

RESOLUTION ADOPTED

Mr. Riggs read a resolution adopted by the board of trustees and a formal report of the scientific and financial achievements of the society under President Lansing's term of nine years in office.

The society's next meeting will be held December 3 at the National Museum. Count Byron Khun de Prorok will address the meeting on his two and one-half years of exploration in the Libyan Desert, where he studied the almost unknown oasis of Jupiter Ammon and the fortified citadel of Siwa.

Mr. BLEASE. I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article from the State, of Columbia, S. C., of the issue of Thursday, November 1, 1928; an article from Time, of the issue of November 12, 1928, and an article from the Fort Mills Times, of Fort Mills, S. C., of November 8, 1928.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the State, Columbia, S. C., Thursday morning, November 1, 1928]

ROBERT LANSING—AN ECHO

Robert Lansing, Secretary of State for a part of the administration of Woodrow Wilson, had so withdrawn from public affairs and interests since his break with the President in 1920 that his quiet death, October 30, seemed no more than a faint echo of a career of controversy and frustration.

It will invite certain students of recent history, particularly, perhaps solely, the circumstances and friction connected with the peace and the league, and new questions raised as to new international relations and responsibilities, to review some of these matters and the controversial part played in them by Mr. Wilson's disputatious but unforceful Secretary of State. But to most readers of history these controversial and personal questions have long since been closed, and remain only as ashes of spent fires.

Robert Lansing was appointed Secretary of State to succeed William Jennings Bryan, with whom Mr. Wilson could not agree as to a correct policy toward German atrocities at sea. And it was soon apparent that, in raising Lansing from his post as a department counselor to supplant the Commoner, Mr. Wilson had merely swapped one bag of quarrels for another. Lansing soon made himself almost intolerable in the office of Secretary of State by intimating—to gratify the lust of the Allies for news that we should join in the struggle against Germany—that we were gradually drawing nearer to the fatal lines of war.

It is frankly admitted by Lansing in his "Personal Narrative" on "The Peace Negotiations," that he could not agree with Wilson. "We did not agree," he says, "we could not agree, since our points of view were so much at variance."

Feeling this way, Lansing should have retired—before the inevitable clash with Wilson's fiery personality moving at high and perilous speed on his "single-track mind." He should not have awaited the brusk dismissal from office.

But the Secretary seemed to be heading a crusade of one against Wilson and all his plans and policies. He opposed almost every proposal of the President in regard to his policy of war or peace and the great covenant of peace. He opposed the President's going in person to Europe, although he was aware that to do so made inevitable the suspicion that Lansing wished to head the delegation which, with Wilson present, would, of course, consist of Wilson only.

The Secretary made the egregious blunder of supposing that he was practically a prime minister. The President is that, plus a little more glamor and authority than the premiers of Europe possess. Whether or not we approve the presence of Wilson in Europe, and agree with Lansing that he should have remained at Washington, leaving to his pallid and disputatious Secretary of State the conduct of the negotiations, there is no doubt that the presence of the Chief Magistrate gave to our embassage a dignity, puissance, and prestige that captured the imagination of the world. We question if the negotiations by cable and letter from the remoteness of Washington would have bettered the situation, for we were playing a game in which the cards were stacked against us by our European opponents and partners.

But, as if all these clashes and crossings of the President's purpose and will were not enough, Lansing took advantage of Wilson's temporary illness to summon meetings of the Cabinet and to discuss the business of the Nation. He even continued to hold such meetings after the crushing rebuke by the President, who sent his private physician, Admiral Grayson, to demand by what authority the Secretary of State had summoned the Cabinet. It is curious that Lansing made no reply to that demand, for another member hastened to say that they had met merely to inquire concerning Mr. Wilson's health * * * a subterfuge that Lansing accepted, and went on holding the banned meetings.

Space nor time nor warrant exist for a discussion of the unhappy conflict between the President and Secretary Lansing; but it is perhaps sufficient to know that, at this fiery point, Mr. Wilson bruskly dismissed the offending Secretary:

"* * * I must say that it would relieve me of embarrassment, Mr. Secretary," he wrote in a famous note that has become a "document," "the embarrassment of feeling your reluctance and divergence of judgment, if you would give your present office up and afford me an opportunity to select some one whose mind would more willingly go along with mine."

To await, in fact to challenge, this curt and justified dismissal was, perhaps, the greatest of the many serious blunders of Secretary Lansing. He could have retired with some degree of dignity, but he courted the shame of being thrust out of the door.

Lansing, although possessed of much personal attraction, was a man of no considerable ability and utterly without power of adaptability and adjustment. He had nothing to offer, and could only oppose, thwart, interfere. Such a character could not exist in the same administration with Woodrow Wilson.

[From the Times, November 12, 1928]

DEATH OF LANSING

Few men were as eager for the portfolio of Secretary of State. Few were as well qualified by experience. Ever since his college days at Amhurst, Robert Lansing's sphere of interest had been world-wide. At 28 he was associate counsel for the United States in the Bering Sea arbitration. Later he represented his country in more international controversies than any other living man. As Undersecretary in 1914 he was the real functionary in Washington while Secretary William Jennings Bryan preached pacifism throughout the country. Once Mr. Lansing was aroused from bed to digress on international law. It was held "unnecessary to disturb Mr. Bryan." In the tense crescendo of feeling which led to the war, Mr. Lansing succeeded Mr. Bryan, was shrewd, logical, firm. He squashed propaganda, refused to be gulled by German Ambassador von Bernstorff. Elihu Root remarked an improvement in State papers.

Naturally, when President Wilson went to the Versailles conference he took the Secretary of State. Mr. Lansing opposed linking the league covenant with the peace treaty, was antagonistic to the treaty itself. He had many erudite theories. But President Wilson had long felt the onrush of foes, foreign and domestic. His visionary ardor had become imperiousness, self-sufficiency. He conferred with the Secretary only once, ignored his ideas. Robert Lansing impotently watched the wise foreign diplomats, wrote in his diary that Mr. Wilson was a "catspaw." The forcible, white-haired Secretary was himself not even permitted the directed force of a paw. His rôle was mere ritual. Often he pondered resigning, often refrained.

Then came the climax. Back in the United States, the President suffered a collapse. The incessant conflict between ideals and adamant realities had begun shattering his nerves. Even Private Secretary Tumulty was denied access to the sick man. Minor crises arose. Spurred by certain Cabinet members, Mr. Lansing called informal conferences. In the distorted imagination of the invalid President this seemed usurpation of authority. The harried idealist, taut with mental anguish, was goaded by a final sense of frustration. He complained. Mr. Lansing resigned.

The Secretary's experience aroused no bitterness. In his writings on the peace negotiations he analyzed President Wilson with the lucidity, penetration, impartiality of a psychologist. He testified to an understanding, a sense of human tragedy which transcended the personal equation. Last week he died of heart disease in Washington, D. C.

LANSING'S DISLOYALTY

Spartanburg Journal: However able and brilliant the record of the late Robert Lansing as a diplomat and statesman, it is shadowed and eclipsed by his disloyalty to his chief. It was while Woodrow Wilson, the great World War President, was stricken with the illness that resulted in his death, that Lansing, as Secretary of State, dealt himself a hand to run things according to his own ideas. The information was spread, not by him personally, that the President was incapacitated from attending Cabinet meetings and attending the duties of his high office. Lansing would have been in line of succession and upon his own initiative he called a Cabinet meeting. Then Mr. Wilson, President of the United States, called Lansing. He wanted to know if Lansing had called such a meeting without consultation or advice with his chief and was told he had. That brought about the break. Mr. Wilson summarily requested Robert Lansing's resignation, and it was forthcoming. It was the only course the President could pursue and maintain his self-respect. Freely according Lansing highest qualities and gifts as a diplomat and statesman, it remains that he exhibited a streak of disloyalty to the one individual to whom he owed the full measure of devotion and fealty.

Mr. BLEASE. I also ask to have printed in the RECORD along with my remarks an article from the Times, of Washington, D. C., of December 21, 1928, headed "Once in the Ash Can."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article referred to is as follows:

[From the Times, Washington, D. C., December 21, 1928]

ONCE IN THE ASH CAN IT'S HARD FOR POLITICIANS OR PARTY TO GET OUT

Politicians and so-called statesmen if they want to stay out of the ash can should keep this clear in their minds.

The people hire them to work in this country for this country, just as they hire a cook to work in their kitchen for their family, not to run around cooking in other peoples' kitchens.

Had Woodrow Wilson been content to attend to his job in hand as President of the United States, "keeping us out of war," he would have been worth to the United States at least $100,000,000,000 more than he was worth. But he could not resist the conviction that the United States was too small for him, that he was made to rule, direct, and incidentally save the whole planet. Saviors are not so numerous.

What happened to Wilson and will happen to others is described by W. R. Hearst in an article published in all of his morning newspapers:

"Would it not be wonderful if the Government of the United States would only attend to the affairs of the United States and not try to regulate all the rest of the world?"

Concerning Mr. Wilson's obsession as to his own grandeur and predestination Mr. Hearst writes:

"Mr. Wilson was the first one to think that he knew more than George Washington and to insist on entangling this country with foreign nations.

"He was elected the first time he ran through the fortunate or unfortunate chance of a split in the Republican Party.

"But the second time he ran he received a genuine indorsement and actual election, and wholly on the assertion—which became a campaign slogan—that he had kept us out of war.

"The mandate of the people of the United States, therefore, in that election was obviously to continue to keep the country free from foreign entanglements.

"But Mr. Wilson disregarded the mandate of the people and the injunction of George Washington, and the practice and policy of all preceding Presidents, and put the country into the great European war.

"Mr. Wilson spent thousands of millions of dollars for our part in the war; he loaned thousands of millions of dollars of American money to foreign nations, and he practically gave away thousands of millions of dollars of the American people's money, as far as our ever getting it back is concerned.

"Then Mr. Wilson went abroad and brought home the League of Nations proposal and submitted it to the people of the United States, and the people buried him and his party with him in the political ash can; and there the party has been ever since, because of the almost unanimous repudiation of the Democratic foreign policy by the voters of the United States."

The words that politicians should ponder are the two words, "ash can." If there is one spot on earth which is not an attractive residence, it is the inside of the political ash can.

Cats, no longer alive, land there, and tomato cans, and broken bottles, and politicians.

It is so simple for politicians to stay out of the ash can and retain public esteem.

Just attend to the business for which you are hired. Do your political cooking in the kitchen of the public that employs you. Don't race around trying to do something somewhere else. Don't try to graft a League of Nations or a World Court or any other nonsense of foreign interference on the Government of this country.

Try to believe that the United States, able to take care of itself when it had only 4,000,000 population, is still able to take care of itself with 120,000,000 population, plus about all the money there is in sight, and more than half of all the world's gold.

In other words, try to believe in your own country, and the people, possibly, will believe in you.

Mr. BLEASE. Now, Mr. President, I have put these articles in the RECORD to show that after Mr. Robert Lansing died and when he was in his grave people who had criticized me for making remarks about a man who was living write dirty articles about this great Secretary of State simply because they did not agree with him politically. I have been wanting the opportunity to put this matter in the RECORD for some time but have held it back. They are guilty of saying about the dead who can not answer. What I said was about one who was living when I said it.

My friend from New York now informs me—and I suppose he knows what he is doing—that I may yield the floor, and so I do.

Mr. COPELAND. I assume that since I have exhausted my time I have no right to speak, but I ask to modify my amendment according to the slip which I send to the desk. I have been insisting that we should not carry out this plan to extend the life of the commission until next March. I should like to terminate it not later than the 31st of December, 1929, and have modified my amendment to that effect. I hope that amendment will be considered by the chairman of the committee, and perhaps he will be willing to accept it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has the right to modify his amendment.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, let the modification be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment as modified.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 1, line 6, it is proposed to strike out "March 16, 1930," and insert "December 31, 1929," so as to read:

shall continue to be vested in and exercised by the commission until December 31, 1929.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York, as modified.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, all I desire to say is that as far as I have authority to do so, I am willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, this fight has gone on here for quite a while, and before this amendment is agreed to I think there ought to be a quorum here. I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Edwards	King	Shortridge
Barkley	Fess	McKellar	Smith
Bayard	Frazier	McMaster	Steiwer
Bingham	George	McNary	Stephens
Black	Glass	Mayfield	Swanson
Blaine	Glenn	Moses	Thomas, Idaho
Blease	Goff	Neely	Thomas, Okla.
Borah	Hale	Norbeck	Trammell
Bratton	Harris	Norris	Tydings
Brookhart	Harrison	Nye	Tyson
Broussard	Hastings	Oddie	Vandenberg
Capper	Hawes	Ransdell	Wagner
Caraway	Hayden	Reed, Pa.	Warren
Copeland	Heflin	Robinson, Ark.	Waterman
Curtis	Johnson	Robinson, Ind.	Watson
Deneen	Jones	Sackett
Dill	Kendrick	Schall
Edge	Keyes	Sheppard

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], as modified.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I think we have perfected the amendment now; and I will ask to have it read to see if it is satisfactory to the chairman of the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment, as modified, will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 6, it is proposed to change the date to "December 31, 1929"; also, on lines 9 and 10, to strike out "the period of three years after the first meeting of the commission," and insert "until December 31, 1929."

Mr. DILL. So the intent and purpose of this paragraph is to continue the original jurisdiction of the commission until December 31, 1929?

Mr. WATSON. That is my understanding.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I have taken no part in the debate to-night, because I was anxious to bring the matter to a vote. Personally, I think it is a very poor way to legislate to continue the commission for this period; but I recognize the situation of the Senate. The closing days of the session are here, and the chairman of the committee is anxious to agree to this, and I do not want to be put in the attitude of holding out for what I believe to be best when it will work such hardship on the Senate.

I understand that the Senator from New York has no objection to the other provisions of the bill.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, of course I have objections to other provisions of the bill, particularly to the paragraph in which it is provided that the terms of the commissioners shall expire on a certain date. I should like to have that whole section stricken out. I am not going to argue about it, but I think the bill would be a very much better bill without that section.

Mr. DILL. The Senator refers to the section which limits the terms of the commissioners to one year?

Mr. COPELAND. That is it.

Mr. DILL. As I understand, the Senator is not pressing that objection?

Mr. COPELAND. I am not pressing it; but it would add very materially to the value of the bill and the activity of the commission if the committee would agree to strike out section 4, which says:

The term of office of each member of the commission shall expire on February 23, 1930, and thereafter commissioners shall be appointed for terms of two, three, four, five, and six years, respectively, as provided in the radio act of 1927.

To my mind, since the law prescribes stated terms and appointments for periods of two, three, four, five, and six years, it would be much better to omit this from the House bill, the same as the Senate bill has done.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON. My understanding is that the Senator is making no request.

Mr. COPELAND. No; I am not. The Senator from Washington asked me if I was satisfied with the rest of the bill. I said frankly that if I had my way I should object; but I am not insisting upon that. I think the chairman of the committee, and the other members of the committee, and Senators generally have been very generous about it, and I am not going to make any point about it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York, as modified.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to further amendment.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I have pending an amendment to this bill which I should like to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert, at the end of the bill, the following:

The commission shall, either through one of its members or an agent authorized by it, hold hearings at the place where is located any radio station or stations whose rights under the license granted it or them are questioned, claimed, or challenged by any other person, firm, company, corporation, radio station, or operator.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I desire to make a very brief statement in support of this amendment. I have no disposition to retard the passage of this bill. I am for it. I wish to state this experience that I have had, however, and I think very likely many other Senators have had the same experience:

In my State there is a constituent of mine who has erected a very large station; but he is an independent man, not connected with any chain, and he is not broadcasting for profit. Some time ago the channel given him was demanded by the State of Iowa, and this gentleman was forced to come here to Washington and bring his experts, his lawyers, and his witnesses. After that was done the State of Nebraska challenged his license, and he had to come here and fight for a license which the Radio Commission had given him; and last week he was forced to bring here about 20 witnesses and experts to resist an effort made on the part of somebody in Oklahoma to take this license away from him. As I understand and as the people of my State who have followed these contests understand the matter, it is an effort made by people who belong to chains to wear him out and to exhaust his funds.

He has spent over $30,000 in the last 18 months to resist the efforts to take away from him that which the commission has granted him, and we are only asking in this amendment that the commission proceed as the Interstate Commerce Commission does, send a man out to take testimony, and report to the commission for adjudication of the case. Mr. Henderson could appear with his counsel before the examiner, without the necessity of employing experts to come here and testify as witnesses.

I think that such a provision as this would help every station in the United States. There is no reason why a man who has been granted a license, and whose license had been sought by some other station wishing to take it away from him, should be required to spend that much money in order to keep that which the Radio Commission has awarded him.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator refers to Mr. Henderson from Shreveport?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree with the Senator from Louisiana, and I hope that his amendment may be adopted.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I may say this: That if I understand the situation, Mr. Henderson is a victim of persecution by other stations, and if he wins this last case some other station will ask for the license, and he will be required to come here again with highly paid lawyers and experts and other witnesses to defend that which the Radio Commission has given him.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I yield.

Mr. DILL. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the Radio Commission now has full power to hold hearings at Shreveport, or at any other place in the United States, but their work has been so pressing up to this time that they have never made regulations covering cases of this kind. It has been the custom to have the person whose wave length was challenged come here, as the Senator has said, and a great hardship has been worked upon certain stations, and particularly this station at Shreveport.

Mr. BROUSSARD. If a station in the Senator's State were challenged, they would have to come 3,000 miles with their witnesses.

Mr. DILL. I may say to the Senator that complaint has been made regarding certain wave lengths in the Northwest, and I have been able, within the last two weeks, to induce the members of the commission to agree to a hearing being held on the Pacific coast, rather than to have the affected parties come here. I believe that the commission will soon adopt that as a practice, and if it does not do so, then I think legislation to compel it to do so would be proper. But this bill must go back to the House, and I know the members of the House committee would be opposed to such an amendment. I hope the Senator will understand that I am in full sympathy with his purpose, but since the law makes possible anyhow what he desires to have the commission directed to do, I should like to give the commission an opportunity to meet the situation without special compulsory legislation.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Let me say to the Senator from Washington that one of the Members of the House, who is to be one of the conferees, happened to be in the gallery when I offered this amendment some time ago, and he took the trouble to come here and tell me that he hoped it might be adopted by the Senate, because he was in favor of it. I think the House would accept it. Of course, the commission is authorized to do this, but they have not done it.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. May I ask whether the station to which the Senator refers is the one at Shreveport?

Mr. BROUSSARD. It is.

Mr. BINGHAM. Is not that the station about which a great many very serious complaints have been received?

Mr. BROUSSARD. That question is before the commission now. I am not talking about Shreveport especially. I merely mention the fact that Mr. Henderson, after acquiring a license and a permit to operate, has been forced to spend $30,000 in fighting to keep his permit, and that may be the case with anybody in any other State. The question of whether he violated the law or not is not involved here, and it is not involved in this amendment.

There has been some complaint; people have complained about the station. Mr. Henderson came here with 178,000 affidavits, covering all the States in the middle section of the Union, and States as far east as the District of Columbia. That is a different matter. I am merely asking that either a member or an agent of the commission be sent to take the testimony and submit it to the commission, instead of requiring a man to come here every two or three months and bring his experts, his lawyers, and his witnesses, at his own expense, to defend that which the Government has awarded him.

Mr. BINGHAM. As I understand the Senator from Washington, that can be done now.

Mr. BROUSSARD. It can be done, but it has not been done, and that is the reason I am asking that this amendment be adopted.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, may I say to my friend from Louisiana that the reason why it has not been done is the lack of funds with which to do it. The commission has been overwhelmed with the complexity of the problem that confronts it. It is an enormous task that they have. Each decision they make brings tens of thousands of letters. They have hundreds and thousands of letters addressed to them which they have never even opened, and there is now a petition in this body, and in the body at the other end of the Capitol, asking permission for the commission to destroy these letters without opening them.

They have not had a sufficient force to attend to the business they have had to do, to say nothing about running over the country.

They understand the necessity of going to the different localities where complaints are made for the purpose of adjusting those complaints, if possible, but I will say with full authority to my friend from Louisiana that if we give them a sufficient force they will be only too happy to carry out the provisions of his amendment, but they can not do it, no matter what the law may be, if they have not the force or have not the money to employ it.

Mr. BROUSSARD. My answer to that is that they have been in existence, I think, for three years——

Mr. DILL. Two years.

Mr. BROUSSARD. And they have not done it. Although they have the authority, they are not doing it. My purpose is to require them to do it. I know that they have the authority to do it, but they have not been doing it. I think that Mr. Henderson has been singled out, and that is why it was brought to my attention. He has been singled out, and there are three stations in different States challenging him. He has to give up his business and employ experts, and the employment of experts to meet a situation in a growing science such as this is is not obtained for small money. It is very expensive to get them.

Mr. Henderson feels, and I feel, too, and there are many other stations in the same situation; that if somebody wants to put an independent station out of business all he has to do is to keep after them every three months and make them spend ten to fifteen thousand dollars. If he has a permit, some agency like the Interstate Commerce Commission, which sends an examiner to take the evidence, should send some one to his place, and when he gets through there, let him go to the next one and take evidence, and submit the cases to the commission so that a man will not be put out of business because some people are interested in seeing that the independent stations are put out of business.

I will say to the Senator from Indiana that I understand they have the authority, but that does not help the fellow who is in trouble. What I want to see done—and I want a vote on this amendment—is to require them to do it, and if we require them to do it, we will have to provide the funds to enable them to do it.

Mr. WATSON. I want to say to the Senator from Louisiana that the members of the present commission have been tremendously criticized about the country because they have not done all and singular the things they ought to have done here in Washington. How could they send anybody out? They have not the force to send out, or the money to employ a force to send out. They have been tremendously criticized because they have not discharged their duties locally right here in the city of Washington, in the head office, and they did not discharge those duties because they have not the force to do it. It is not their fault; it is the fault of Congress.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I am not blaming the commission. I am in sympathy with the commission. But I do not want the commission to give us as an excuse that they are not doing it because they have not the force, because, if we adopt this amendment, we will have to give them the force to do it. I think, instead of keeping all of them here, if they went to the respective communities where contests were held, and then held conferences, they could settle the matters.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. This is an example of exactly what I have in mind about the necessity of having a full-time and continued commission, in order that the commission may have time to deal with large problems. Instead of being here, cumbered about with the cares of office and all the petty details which could be taken care of by technical clerks, they would have time to go and settle a problem of this sort when it was of a magnitude which justified it. What the Senator has said is another proof that the position which I have assumed through these eight hours of debate to-day is a sound one.

Whether or not it is wise to write into the law this particular suggestion is not the question. These men, of necessity, when they are relieved of their duties, as they will be after the 1st of January, I trust, and are able to give themselves to the activities of the judicial position which they have, as well as the administrative, would naturally take up a question of this sort, and in the very nature of things a member of the commission would go to deal with that particular problem.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I think that the argument made by the Senator from New York would apply if his theory of what should be done were carried out. I am for the bill, and I think a majority of the Senate is for the bill, and it has already passed the House of Representatives.

I want this amendment in the bill in order that the people who have expended money may be protected.

Mr. Henderson, for instance, is not making a cent out of this station. He is spending his money, and is required to come here every three or four months to defend himself against people who are claiming against him.

Mr. BINGHAM. Why does it take an expert to testify in a case where one who listens in, so far as I have been able to learn—I never happened to listen in, but I have had a great many statements about it—will agree that what this particular station put out over the air was not fit to be broadcast?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I think that if the Senator had listened in he would have disagreed with the statement he is making now.

Mr. BINGHAM. Why does it take an expert to decide that?

Mr. BROUSSARD. It is not a question of an expert testifying as to what is broadcast.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator said he had to bring experts to Washington.

Mr. BROUSSARD. If what he says is questioned, his permit may be revoked by direct action in the matter. They are not trying to revoke his license. They are merely trying to take it away from him and give him another permit. They are not charging him with anything at all. I attended the trials. There was no charge made against Mr. Henderson.

I want to make this statement—that anybody who understands anything about radio will realize that where a man is forced to employ experts, not to say whether he used obscene language or anything of that kind; but to testify as to whether from a scientific standpoint he is entitled to retain his license, he must have somebody who knows what he is talking about.

I would like to see the Senate adopt this amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GEORGE (when his name was called). On this matter I have a pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS];

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN];

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT]; and

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF].

The result was announced—yeas 14, nays 40, as follows:

YEAS—14

Blease	Heflin	Ransdell	Tydings
Bratton	McKellar	Robinson, Ark.	Tyson

So Mr. BROUSSARD'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], if it is permissible to sell or transfer these licenses and put them under one control? I had a letter from my State saying that a number of licenses were being put under one control. I am wondering if the commission permits the transfer or sale of licenses without application first being made to the commission.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Indiana permit me to answer the question?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I shall be glad to have either Senator answer the question.

Mr. DILL. The law provides that no license may be transferred without the consent of the commission. There is no provision of law that will prohibit the selling of a station, but there is a provision that the license can not be transferred without the consent of the commission.

Mr. WATSON. I would like to ask the Senator from Tennessee whether or not he has inquired of the commission if they granted a permit to transfer the license?

Mr. MCKELLAR. No; I have not. I just received a letter late this afternoon and read it hurriedly before I came to the Senate Chamber.

Mr. WATSON. The licensees have no authority to transfer without the consent of the commission.

Mr. MCKELLAR. It seemed to me if there was no provision in the bill that a license should not be sold or transferred without the consent of the commission, there ought to be such a provision incorporated in it.

Mr. DILL. There is such a provision in the law.

Mr. WATSON. I have the law here and know there is such a provision in it, though I am not able to point to it at the moment.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Both Senators having assured me there is such a provision in the law, I shall not insist upon an amendment to that effect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will receive a message from the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 117) authorizing an investigation and survey for a Nicaraguan canal, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9285) to provide for the settlement of claims against the United States on account of property damage, personal injury, or death, asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. UNDERHILL, Mr. IRWIN, and Mr. BULWINKLE were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

PANAMA CANAL AND SURVEY FOR NICARAGUAN CANAL

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives to Senate Joint Resolution 117.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I make the point of order that that motion is not in order at this time. There is a measure now pending. The matter to which the Senator from New Jersey refers is not a privileged matter.

Mr. EDGE. Oh, yes, it is a privileged matter and it does not displace the unfinished business at all. It is perfectly proper under the rules to ask for action on a message from the House of Representatives at any time, I repeat, without displacing the unfinished business. I have made the motion that the Senate concur in the amendment made in the House of Representatives to Senate Joint Resolution 117.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is in order.

Mr. DILL. I understand this is a motion to concur in an amendment made by the House and is not a conference report. It is simply an amendment that has been adopted by the House and comes over here in that form. It is not a privileged matter to move to concur in the amendment at this time. The regular business now before the Senate takes precedence, being the radio bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is a privileged motion.

Mr. EDGE. It is a privileged motion and I understand the Chair has so decided.

Mr. DILL. I want to know first what the amendment is.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, have we not the right to have it read so we may know what it is?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is debatable. The clerk will read the amendment of the House.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
March 1, 1929.

Resolved, That the joint resolution from the Senate (S. J. Res. 117) entitled "Joint resolution authorizing an investigation and survey for a Nicaraguan canal," do pass with the following amendments:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the President is hereby authorized to cause to be made, under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers, and with the aid of such civilian engineers as the President shall deem advisable, a full and complete investigation and survey for the purpose of ascertaining the practicability and the approximate cost of constructing and maintaining (1) such additional locks and other facilities at the Panama Canal as may be necessary to provide for the future needs of interoceanic shipping; and (2) any other route for a ship canal between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans.

"SEC. 2. The President is hereby authorized to cause to be made, under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers, and with the aid of such civilian engineers as the President shall deem advisable, a full and complete investigation and survey for the purpose of revising and bringing down to date the reports of the Isthmian Canal Commission transmitted to Congress, with respect to the practicability and advantages and approximate cost of constructing a canal across Nicaragua, and for the purpose of obtaining all additional available information respecting (1) the most practical route for an interoceanic ship canal across the Republic of Nicaragua by way of the San Juan River and the Great Lake of Nicaragua, or by way of any other route over Nicaraguan territory, including suitable locations for harbors at each of the termini thereof; (2) the practicability and approximate cost of constructing and maintaining such canal; and (3) the approximate cost of acquiring all private rights, properties, privileges, and franchises, if any, included in or necessarily affected by such canal route.

"SEC. 3. The Chief of Engineers, under the direction of the Secretary of War, may establish and maintain, during the investigations and surveys authorized by this resolution, such stations as he may deem necessary for ascertaining the water supply available for the operation of a canal across Nicaragua or elsewhere and for the operation of the additional locks and other facilities at the Panama Canal.

"SEC. 4. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $150,000, to be expended by the Secretary of War for the purposes of this resolution and to remain available until expended.

"SEC. 5. The President is hereby requested to report to the Congress not later than two years from the approval of this resolution the results of the investigations and surveys hereby authorized, together with such recommendations in connection therewith as he may deem advisable."

Amend the title so as to read: "Joint resolution authorizing an investigation and survey for the purpose of ascertaining the practicability and the approximate cost of constructing and maintaining additional locks and other facilities at the Panama Canal, and for the purpose of ascertaining the practicability and probable cost of constructing and maintaining an interoceanic ship canal across the Republic of Nicaragua."

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I will speak very briefly on my motion. The Senator from Washington has insisted——

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield just a moment?

Mr. EDGE. I yield for a question.

Mr. BLEASE. The question is that I would like to have the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES] present. He is not present. I am going to try to keep this matter from being adopted by any means I can until he is present. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. EDGE. I yielded for a question and not for any other business.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Barkley	Edge	Keyes	Sackett
Bayard	Edwards	King	Schall
Bingham	Fess	McKellar	Sheppard
Black	Frazier	McMaster	Smith
Blaine	George	McNary	Steiwer
Blease	Glenn	Mayfield	Thomas, Idaho
Borah	Goff	Moses	Trammell
Bratton	Harris	Neely	Tydings
Broussard	Harrison	Norbeck	Tyson
Capper	Hastings	Norris	Vandenberg
Copeland	Hawes	Nye	Warren
Couzens	Hayden	Oddie	Waterman
Curtis	Heflin	Ransdell	Watson
Dale	Johnson	Reed, Pa.
Deneen	Jones	Robinson, Ark.
Dill	Kendrick	Robinson, Ind.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The Senator from New Jersey is entitled to the floor.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, the joint resolution as it has been returned from the House is, in effect, the same as the joint resolution which was passed without a roll call by the Senate. It provides simply for two surveys—one as to the possibility of increasing the facilities of the Panama Canal and the other as to the practicability and feasibility of the construction of the Nicaraguan canal under the terms of the right of way purchased by the United States some 15 years ago. The material change in the joint resolution as returned to the Senate is, in effect, striking out——

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. EDGE. Will not the Senator permit me to make a brief explanation?

Mr. DILL. I want to make a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington will state his point of order.

Mr. DILL. I call attention to the last sentence of paragraph 7 of Rule VII, which provides that—

Any motion so made—

As the Senator from New Jersey has made his motion—shall be determined without debate.

I call the attention of the President of the Senate to the fact that if this ruling is to stand, then hereafter when any Senate bill comes back from the House of Representatives, no matter how it may be amended there or how it may be changed, it will be in order for any Senator to move that the amendment shall be concurred in, and no Senator can speak from the floor. That is the meaning of the rule if it is followed as it is in the Manual of Rules.

Mr. EDGE. Then the point made by the Senator from Washington is that the motion made is not subject to debate?

Mr. DILL. If the motion which the Senator from New Jersey made that the Senate concur in the amendment is in order as a privileged motion, then it is not debatable, and the Chair is laying down the rule that in the future as to any Senate bill coming back from the House, no matter how it may be amended, any Senator may rise and move that the amendment be concurred in, and the question would be decided without debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion to lay a matter coming from the House before the Senate is not debatable. After the matter has been laid before the Senate, and a motion is made in respect to it, such motion is debatable under the rules.

Mr. DILL. But the right——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. If it is debatable after it is laid before the Senate, would it not be amendable? That is to say, if the House has amended a Senate bill and the Senate bill is brought back again——

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is amendable.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. The motion of the Senator from New Jersey was not to lay the House amendment before the Senate but to concur in the amendment.

Mr. EDGE. I beg the Senator's pardon. My first request was that the message from the House of Representatives be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair laid it before the Senate.

Mr. DILL. Now, what is before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has laid the amendment of the House before the Senate, and the question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDGE. There is pending before the Senate a motion to concur in the amendment made by the House of Representatives.

Mr. DILL. I make the point that the motion is not in order, because that is a motion to take up proposed legislation when there is proposed legislation pending. That is not a privileged motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a privileged matter.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, when interrupted——

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Does not that displace the unfinished business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It does not displace the unfinished business.

Mr. BLEASE. Then it is going to take some time to debate it.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, that is a matter entirely within the option of the Members of the Senate.

I repeat that the joint resolution as it comes from the House in no material degree changes the joint resolution as passed by the Senate. The House did strike from the joint resolution the request contained in the Senate joint resolution that the President should negotiate with Nicaragua and Costa Rica and other countries as to certain rights which they might have should the Congress of the United States finally determine to build the Nicaraguan canal, but otherwise the joint resolution is precisely the same in its terms and in its wording as the joint resolution which was passed without a roll call by the Senate.

Mr. President, I wish further to say that during the debate night before last, when we were kept in the Chamber until after 2 a. m. in an effort to prevent the adoption of an amendment to the deficiency bill providing the appropriation authorized by the joint resolution, the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] insisted that he would withdraw his objection—at least, that he would cease his filibuster, or whatever it might be termed—if the Senate would vote the next day at a certain hour provided in the unanimous-consent agreement. Then, in the course of a very confused colloquy with other Members of the Senate, most of them standing in the middle aisle, the Senator further insisted that it should be understood—I will read his language:

> Mr. DILL. Before consent is given, I want to be sure that I have an understanding that if the Nicaraguan joint resolution be not passed by the House, and signed by the President, the Senate conferees will not bring back this appropriation. I think that was the understanding.

The leader of the majority, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], replied:

> That statement has twice been made on the floor.

Previous to that the Senator from Washington on several occasions during the debate had remarked, in effect, that he was opposing the amendment to the pending appropriation bill because the House of Representatives had not acted upon the joint resolution which furnished the authorization for the appropriation. In fact, on page 4568 of the RECORD of Wednesday last, the Senator, among other things, said:

> I have said before and I say again that if the joint resolution had been passed by both Houses and the appropriation for carrying out the will expressed by the Congress were before us, I might have something to say against it, but I would not attempt to delay action and discuss it as I have discussed the amendment here to-night.

Other references of a similar character were made.

Mr. President, there is only one way to carry out this rather unusual demand on the part of the Senator from Washington that the President sign a joint resolution, and that, of course, is obviously that the President have the opportunity to sign it. I have made a motion that the Senate concur in the amendment made in the House of Representatives. I am entirely satisfied with it. If that motion shall prevail, then, of course, the legislation will be complete, so far as the Senate and House of Representatives are concerned, and the joint resolution will go to the President. If, however, the Senator from Washington shall refuse to permit that to happen, I ask, in all fairness, what type of ethics is that? The Senator drives a bargain that an amendment to a pending appropriation bill shall not be concurred in by the conferees of the Senate unless the joint resolution shall become a law, and then he indicates from his opposition to my motion that he does not propose to permit it to become a law.

The Senate and the House of Representatives have each on two occasions by outstanding majorities demonstrated their absolute acquiescence in the purpose and intent of the joint resolution.

The Senate, without a roll call, passed the joint resolution a few days ago. A roll call was not even asked. That, of course, was a plain indication of the overwhelming feeling of the Senate that the joint resolution should pass. Later, when the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations providing for the appropriation carried in the joint resolution was again considered, after half a night of filibuster, after this agreement was made, after this demand was in a way acquiesced in, the Senate the following morning by a vote, as I recall, of 59 to 19, adopted the amendment, again showing by a majority of something like 3 to 1 its desire that the investigation and survey should be made.

Then the appropriation bill went to the House of Representatives. The first action of the House of Representatives was a motion on the part of the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, Representative WOOD, that the rules of the House be suspended in order that the House conferees could, in their best judgment, agree to the various amendments adopted by the Senate which had not been acted upon by the House. That motion was objected to by another Representative because the appropriation for the so-called Nicaraguan-Panama survey was included, and last evening in the House of Representatives a debate was carried on for some time concerning entirely that one amendment. On a division of the House, after the conclusion of the debate, the conferees of the House were given this authority by a vote of 238 to 6.

That was the first action in the House.

Not being satisfied even with that, in order as far as it was humanly possible or from the standpoint of parliamentary tactics possible to meet the demands of the Senator from Washington, I suggested that the amended joint resolution be brought up in the House to-day; and under a rule it was brought up in the House to-day, and a full and free debate on both sides, lasting for two or three hours, occurred in the House this afternoon on the joint resolution now before the Senate. It passed the House by a vote of something like 180 to fifty-odd, and now it is before the Senate with the amendment made by the House, and my motion before the Senate is to concur in it.

Mr. President, with four distinct actions—two in the Senate and two in the House—overwhelmingly carried, with the proposition of the Senator from Washington himself, which I am trying, as far as possible, to carry out in the few hours that are left, I say that, in all fairness, my motion to concur in this amendment should be adopted by the Senate.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. EDGE. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. BRATTON. Will the Senator tell us briefly the substance of the amendment of the House?

Mr. EDGE. I shall be glad to do so.

The joint resolution, as it was returned from the House, includes all of the original Senate joint resolution, so far as it provided for the investigation of the possibility of increasing the facilities of the Panama Canal, so far as it provided for the investigation of the feasibility and practicability of constructing a Nicaraguan canal, so far as it carried the desire presented by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] that any other practicable route should be investigated; also the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES], providing that civilian engineers should be included upon the option of the President, in the exact wording of his amendment. The only matter stricken from the original joint resolution was the suggestion made by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]—and he has agreed with me that we should concur in the House amendment—that should we decide later to build a Nicaraguan canal the President should be requested to negotiate with the countries that have rights or claim to have rights in the matter, as to what those rights are, and as to how they can be adjusted.

That is the only thing stricken from the original joint resolution.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, under the joint resolution as finally passed by the House would the President have authority to enter into agreements with those countries?

Mr. EDGE. As passed by the House, that is all stricken out.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. EDGE. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Was the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES] with reference to civilian engineers mandatory on the President or optional?

Mr. EDGE. It was optional on the part of the President. It was so continued by the House, in the exact language used by the Senate.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, the joint resolution as passed by the House does not contain the language of the Senate measure nor does it contain at all what the joint resolution that passed the Senate contained. In a general way, it covers the same subject. All reference to any treaties with other Central American countries has been stricken out. There was a very simple reason for that, because if the joint resolution had gone to the Committee on Foreign Relations in the House, it would have not been reported favorably.

The Senator from New Jersey became quite enthusiastic and rather excited in his discussion here. There is no reason for that. I did insist to-day that this joint resolution should be passed and signed by the President before the appropriation should be contained in the conference report, and I insisted on that because that is the agreement that was made by the conferees on the part of the Senate before a vote was agreed upon on this amendment to the deficiency bill. I asked the Senator, when this matter came over here, to defer it until after the radio bill was disposed of; but the Senator seems excited, and thinks this measure must be taken up now or it never will be taken up.

So far as I am concerned, I did not intend, had he let it go until after the radio bill was disposed of, to do more than object to the House amendment and state my reasons for my opposition.

I think the Senator has caused to be made here a precedent about legislation coming over from the House that will come back to plague the Senate in the future in a way that it will make it necessary to reverse the precedent made this evening. In other words it means, no matter what may be before the Senate, that any bill coming over from the House, whether any Senate committee ever considered it or not, must immediately be given precedence over the legislation before the Senate if any Senator so desires; that it is a privileged matter so to move.

I do not believe there is anything in the rules that will justify any such ruling. I believe in a more sober hour, when there is not this pressure for legislation in the minds of Senators, and they can be induced to think seriously about the meaning of these rules, and the Presiding Officer is not in too big a rush to help in getting the desired legislation up for action, that precedent will be overturned.

Mr. President, I have felt it my duty to fight this Nicaraguan legislation. I believe that it is one of the most objectionable pieces of legislation that has been passed by this Congress.

I am confident in my own mind that not only has it been backed primarily by the Bureau of the Budget but no less a person than the President himself has been insisting that this measure be passed and this appropriation made in order that engineers may be gotten in Nicaragua to give excuse to keep the American marines down there and to maintain the financial policy that American investors have tried to maintain there.

I have used much energy and consumed much of the patience of the Senate in fighting this joint resolution, probably more than I should have used. I still say that an unfair, unjust, and indefensible advantage was taken by the Committee on Appropriations that framed the deficiency bill when they put this appropriation in here when the joint resolution had not yet passed the House of Representatives; and it never would have been done if there had not been a pressure from behind—a pressure greater than any one Senator can bring to bear; a pressure that comes from the very head of the administration, and that has behind it the purpose of keeping the marines down there at a time when that country is at peace.

I have felt a duty, because of these facts and because of the sentiment of the American people, to fight this legislation; but I recognize that a man in this body, after all, can do no more than use his best efforts and make the best fight that he can make.

I think it would not be at all impossible to organize a fight here to prevent the adoption of this motion by the Senator from New Jersey, but I recognize that that would be a very unfair attitude for me to take, even if I were able to get enough other Senators to combine with me for that purpose; and I do not think it would be at all fair to the rest of the Senate and to the country to take that attitude. Therefore I shall content myself with having made this protest, with having made this fight; and I hope that even the Senator from New Jersey will recognize that some of us believe in keeping a bargain, even though he does not. His attitude to-day was that we could disregard the agreement made with the conferees, and accept anything that might have been done by the House of Representatives.

I do not believe the conferees would take that attitude. I hope they would not. I believe they are men who, when they give their word, will keep their word. I am confident that they would not ask the Senate to accept this amendment, providing $150,000 for sending engineers to Nicaragua, unless the agreement made the other morning, after a long and protracted discussion, was complied with.

Of course, if I took advantage of the situation by means of a filibuster or by other means that I might adopt of discussion, probably I would be unfair myself; but if, in the regular course of business, this joint resolution can not become a law, and if there is no undue delay, I maintain that I am justified in expecting the Senate, particularly the conferees on the part of the Senate on the deficiency bill, to carry out the agreement that was made before we voted on the measure; and I shall expect that to be done before the appropriation is agreed to.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I want to compliment and congratulate the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] upon the success he has achieved in the passage of this joint resolution. It is but the carrying out of a policy laid down by a very far-seeing statesman from my State, the late Senator John T. Morgan, who, many years ago, served here for many years. He saw then what the Senate sees now. That frequently happens with far-seeing statesmen. They see in advance what is to be, and their fellows and associates around them do not appreciate at the time the true situation.

Senator Morgan saw this. He realized that the day would come when this Nation would need a Nicaraguan canal, and he convinced the Nation that he was right about it; but another powerful movement came on very suddenly opposing the Nicaragua proposition, and the Panama Canal was built.

Senator Morgan predicted that the day would come when that canal would not be operated; that it would be put out of commission; that the Nicaraguan route was the proper one, and the Nation one day would come to it. The Senator from New Jersey has seen that, and has worked very hard and ably to bring about the result which we now have in this body.

I stand with the Senator from Washington on the matter of bringing the marines out of Nicaragua. My resolution to that end was pending in this body for a year, and we could not get any action on it.

At the time the measure sponsored by the Senator from New Jersey was passed the other day, nothing was being done by the administration to bring the marines out of Nicaragua, and I dare say to him they would not have been brought out by now, even if this measure had not been passed; but I want to say to the Senator from Washington that when we get into the extra session, I am ready to join him and other Senators in a move to bring the marines out of Nicaragua. This other proposition, as I see it, has nothing on earth to do with keeping them there.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. DILL. The Senator recognizes that the only reason why the marines will ever be brought out of Nicaragua will be that the public opinion of the world will compel that they be brought out, but if we get a lot of engineers down in Nicaragua, and then some American interests cause some natives down there to start shooting a little bit, in the form of a revolution, the Senator knows there is no public opinion in the world that will cause them to be brought out at any time.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the work we are to do there now is to make a survey, and the Senator himself said in his speech the other night that it would be several years—I think 50 or 60 years—before we ought to build the canal. Certainly the Senator does not contend that we are going to keep marines down there for 50 years.

Mr. DILL. I think there will be a method found to keep them there right along.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. I do not intend to discuss this matter, but I want to ask the Senator from Alabama if he does not think it is very unfortunate that we should now suggest a survey for a Nicaraguan canal, which may be, and in the minds of a great many will be, looked upon as a reason for keeping the marines there? Does he not think it is very unfortunate that this resolution should be passed while this matter is being agitated and so many of the American people are opposed to the continuance of these marines there and do not believe that we had any right to send them there under the circumstances, now that the purpose for which they were alleged to have been sent there, namely, the holding of the election, has been accomplished, and the reason given as to why we were justified in keeping them there has ended? Does he not think it unfortunate that before there is an organized effort on the part of Congress to provide that they shall come back, we are now about to embark upon a project which may give the shadow of excuse, and be seized upon as a reason, for keeping the marines there?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. In a moment. I do not think so, I will say in answer to the Senator from South Carolina, because we can not afford to wait on any suggestion like that. This Government has a big foreign trade, and we propose to protect it, and the time is coming when we are going to need that Nicaraguan canal. I think the part of true statesmanship is to go ahead and make the arrangement in advance, and to have this Nicaraguan route all surveyed and ready for action when we decide to use it.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I just want to ask the Senator a question. Is the necessity for the surveying of this route so pressing that we are justified in passing such a measure as this, giving effect to the arguments of those who are in favor of the marines being kept there? Does he not think we would better address ourselves to removing them? We could have discussed that, perhaps, during this session. Surely we could have done it in the extraordinary session that is now imminent, or at least in the regular session in December, and, once we had accomplished that, then there would have been no inference and no seeming sinister motive to be attached to the survey of the canal.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am truly astonished to hear this argument by the Senator from South Carolina, because, as I remember, two or three days ago, when we had an opportunity to vote to bring the marines out, the Senator from South Carolina voted against bringing the marines out.

Mr. SMITH. I am glad the Senator has called attention to that, for the change in the vote was with regard to an amendment that would have jeopardized another piece of legislation that had nothing whatever to do with the principle involved. I did not feel that it was good common sense to destroy a good thing and accomplish nothing, with the vote I was supposed to cast, when the opportunity would be given me to vote on both the questions on their merits, without involving or jeopardizing the success of either. That was my stand, and what will continue to be my stand. I do not propose to destroy a good thing in attempting to get another good thing, when I shall have the opportunity perhaps of getting both of them without endangering either.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, the Senator could not expect——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama continue to yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. May I just say this? Hearing the contention of the Senator that this would give color to the arguments of those who are opposed to bringing the marines out, when I remembered that when he had an opportunity to vote to bring the marines out he did not vote that way, but voted against bringing them out, I was astonished.

Mr. SMITH. The Senator is making exactly my argument, if the Senator from Alabama will allow me.

Mr. HEFLIN. I hope the Senator will be brief.

Mr. SMITH. Why should I vote to bring the soldiers out through an amendment on another bill, when we could have voted first to bring them out, and then voted for a survey of the canal? That was the position I took.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama continue to yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. No.

Mr. McKELLAR. Just one more question.

Mr. HEFLIN. I can not yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. I would rather the Senator spoke in his own time.

Mr. McKELLAR. As I remember, the Senator from South Carolina voted first to bring them out, and then the next day voted against bringing them out. So his argument is truly the more astonishing.

Mr. SMITH. Wise men change their minds sometimes. I have understood that others do not. I prefer to be in the class that has at least historical foundation of having some sense.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, as the Senate knows, I am the first Senator who introduced a resolution to bring the marines out of Nicaragua. I worked for weeks and months to get action on the resolution, but the Senate did not see fit to act favorably. The Committee on Naval Affairs reported my resolution adversely.

I want to state that I am heartily in favor of bringing the marines out, but the administration is not in favor of doing that. The Senate went on record the other afternoon in favor of bringing them out, and on the next day, with pressure having been brought, I take it, from the White House, the vote in this body was changed, and the action of the day before reversed, and the judgment of the Senate was not to bring them out. That part of it is settled, but that does not preclude us from making an effort to bring them out when we meet again in April.

I repeat, the measure sponsored by the Senator from New Jersey is a meritorious one, it looks to the great trade development of this, the greatest Nation in all the world, and we can not afford to hold back these projects looking to the continued life and development of our Nation because somebody has an idea that somebody might fire on a surveyor, and that somebody would ask for more marines to be sent down there. We will pass on that when the question arises.

Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.

Mr. President, this Nation is going to stand, as it always has stood, upon its rights upon the free seas. We are going to protect our flag wherever it flies. We are going to demand the right to ship American goods to all ports on earth, and no government will be permitted to stand in the way of this great Nation as it sends its produce into the various market places on earth.

We do not propose to impose upon anybody. We are not asking anything of them that we will not grant to them. We want a fair deal with all, but I submit that if the time should ever come, under any circumstances, when the Panama Canal might be seized by some foreign power, we would be helpless without the Nicaraguan route.

Mr. President, I will detain the Senate but a moment more, because I want to get through with the work we have here. I hope to have some sleep myself to-night. I trust it will not be necessary to stay here all night. I am willing to stay here all night if we are transacting business, but I am not willing to stay here all night to hear somebody conduct a filibuster that is not worth 5 cents.

If a great principle is involved, I am willing to stay and work as late as anybody, and lose a night's sleep, but the great business of this Government must go on, and to the end that it may, and speedily, I will conclude my remarks. I am in favor of the measure of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE].

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I have heard from the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES], and he says that this joint resolution is satisfactory to him, that the amendment which he wanted is incorporated in it.

Mr. EDGE. I will say to the Senator that the amendment is incorporated in the exact words in which it was offered by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. BLEASE. I wish to say, however, Mr. President, that I do not think anybody in this Chamber needs to be told how I stood in the late presidential election. Regardless of my personal feelings, I campaigned and worked and voted for Smith. I said some pretty hard things against Mr. Herbert Hoover. I do not know whether he ever heard of it or not, and I do not care. If he has not heard of it, I will send him copies of it. But when he gets to be President of the United States, he will be my President, and it will be my pleasure to help uphold his hand whenever I think he is right in the administration of the affairs of Government.

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], a while ago, made some insinuation in reference to a change of vote on this canal question the other day. I want to tell him why I changed my vote, so that neither he nor anyone else will be worried about it. I voted one afternoon one way, and the next morning the other way.

We have a navy yard down at Charleston, S. C., that was in pretty bad shape.

The Government has been asking to close it up and I believe would have closed it up if the $300,000 appropriation in the bill which has just been agreed to had not been passed. The chances are that it will make the Charleston Navy Yard a permanent proposition and that the Government will do what it should do by it and take care of it.

I was reliably told that if the bill went through with the Nicaraguan provision in it, the chances were it would be vetoed and I changed my vote to save the Charleston (S. C.) Navy Yard. I have no apologies to make to anybody for it and no excuses to offer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] to concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

SETTLEMENT OF CLAIMS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9285) to provide for the settlement of claims against the United States on account of property damage, personal injury, or death, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President, I move that the request of the House for a conference be granted, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. McMASTER, Mr. WATERMAN, and Mr. BAYARD conferees on the part of the Senate.

FEDERAL RADIO COMMISSION

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15430) continuing the powers and authority of the Federal Radio Commission under the radio act of 1927, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is still as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ENLARGEMENT OF CAPITOL GROUNDS

Mr. KEYES and others addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] is recognized.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, is there not a unanimous-consent agreement?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be made effective in a moment.

Mr. KEYES. Mr. President, the committee on order of business has designated a certain bill to follow the radio bill which we have just passed. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 1485, the bill (H. R. 13929) to provide for the enlarging of the Capitol Grounds.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate as in Committee of the whole proceeded to consider the bill which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments.

THE CALENDAR

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to proceed with the unanimous-consent agreement made last night, to wit, the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. KING. That presupposes the laying aside temporarily of the unfinished business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes; the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside and the unanimous-consent agreement entered into yesterday will now be proceeded with. The clerk will report the first bill on the calendar under the unanimous-consent agreement.

WORLD'S POULTRY CONGRESS

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 382) to send delegates and an exhibit to the Fourth World's Poultry Congress to be held in England in 1930 was announced as first in order under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. BLEASE. Over.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his objection a moment until I can say a word about the joint resolution? I thought last night we had an agreement with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] that by striking out the amount of money for traveling expenses he would have no objection.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The deficiency bill which has just been agreed to by the House and doubtless will be agreed to by the Senate to-morrow, provides for $25,000 for this exhibit. The bill on the calendar is the same which was negatived by the Foreign Relations Committee and provides for the exhibit.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator. I have no further question to ask about it.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Let the joint resolution go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be passed over.

NAVAL AIRSHIP BASE

The bill (H. R. 16839) to provide for investigation of sites suitable for the establishment of a naval airship base was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is directed to appoint a board of naval officers to examine and report upon such locations as may be deemed most suitable for the establishment of a naval airship base and to submit to the Congress the report of said board concerning the several locations considered and his recommendations as to the location of the airship base, together with estimates in detail of cost of the best sites available and of the structures, facilities, and improvements necessary to the efficiency of the airship base.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, what sites are to be investigated?

Mr. HALE. This is a bill providing for an investigation of suitable sites for a hangar for lighter-than-air ships on the Pacific coast. We are now building a great dirigible which before long will come into use, and when it is completed we have no hangar on the west coast in which to keep it. The bill merely provides for the making of an investigation of the various sites in order that we may select a suitable site.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have no objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE, NIOBRARA, NEBR.

The bill (S. 5875) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Niobrara, Nebr., was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read. The bill had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment in line 8, to strike out "1928" and insert "1929," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Niobrara, Nebr., authorized to be built by H. A. Rinder, his heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, by act of Congress approved May 22, 1928, are hereby extended one and three years, respectively, from May 22, 1929.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, may I ask if this is the same part of the river that is referred to in certain bridge bills which I have introduced?

Mr. NORRIS. No; it is an entirely different place.

Mr. COPELAND. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE BILLS

The following House bridge bills were considered in Committee of the Whole, reported to the Senate without amendment, read the third time, and passed:

H. R. 16982. An act authorizing J. E. Robinson, his heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Tombigbee River at or near Coffeeville, Ala.;

H. R. 17075. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Red River of the North at or near Fargo, N. Dak.;

H. R. 17127. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Des Moines River at or near Croton, Iowa;

H. R. 17140. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Mahoning River at or near Warren, Trumbull County, Ohio;

H. R. 17141. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of an overhead viaduct across the Mahoning River at or near Niles, Trumbull County, Ohio; and

H. R. 17185. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River at or near Cairo, Ill.

DECLARATION OF INTENTION IN NATURALIZATION PROCEEDINGS

The bill (H. R. 16440) relating to declarations of intentions in naturalization proceedings was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill had been reported from the Committee on Immigration with an amendment, on page 2, line 14, after the word "alien" to add the following:

No declaration of intention of petition for naturalization shall be made outside of the office of the clerk of the court,

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first subdivision of section 4 of the act entitled "An act to establish a Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization and provide for a uniform rule for the naturalization of aliens throughout the United States," approved June 29, 1906, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"First. He shall declare on oath before the clerk of any court authorized by this act to naturalize aliens, or his authorized deputy, in the district in which such alien resides, two years at least prior to his admission, and after he has reached the age of 18 years, that it is bona fide his intention to become a citizen of the United States and to reside permanently therein, and that he will, before being admitted to citizenship, renounce forever all allegiance and fidelity to any foreign prince, potentate, state, or sovereignty, and particularly, by name, to the prince, potentate, state, or sovereignty of which the alien may be at the time of admission a citizen or subject. Such declaration shall set forth the name, age, occupation, personal description, place of birth, last foreign residence, the date of arrival, the name of the vessel, if any, in which he came to the United States, and the present place of residence in the United States of said alien. No declaration of intention or petition for naturalization shall be made outside of the office of the clerk of court."

SEC. 2. Section 1 of this act shall take effect 60 days after its enactment. A declaration of intention made before the expiration of such 60-day period, whether before or after the enactment of this act, in which appears an erroneous statement of allegiance, shall not be held invalid for such cause if the error was due to a change of political boundaries, or the creation of new countries, or the transfer of territory from one country to another. Nothing in this section shall permit the reinstatement of a petition for naturalization dismissed for such cause, but in such a case the benefits of this section may be obtained by filing a new petition before the expiration of the period of validity of the declaration of intention.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I send to the desk the following amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, after line 4, insert as an additional section:

SEC. 3. An alien veteran, as defined in section 1 of the act of May 26, 1926 (ch. 398, 44 Stat. 654, title 8, sec. 241, U. S. C. Supl. I), shall, if residing in the United States, be entitled, at any time within two years after the enactment of this act, to naturalization upon the same terms, conditions, and exemptions which would have been accorded to such alien if he had petitioned before the armistice of the World War, except that such alien shall be required to appear and file his petition in person and to take the prescribed oath of allegiance in open court.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas rose.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me a word of explanation?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I was just going to ask the Senator to state the purpose of the bill.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. During the World War alien soldiers who had taken the oath of allegiance and were a part of the Army were permitted to be naturalized by a rather short proceeding. On May 26, 1926, Congress enacted a law providing that within two years after that date an alien veteran who, had he applied during the World War, might have been naturalized, should have the same right if he applied within two years after the passage of the act, provided, of course, that his service during the war had been honorable, that he had been honorably discharged, and that he had otherwise behaved himself well since that time.

This amendment would merely extend that privilege to alien veterans who had served honorably during the World War and before the armistice—that is, during the period of hostilities—and would give them the same privilege they had had during the past two years. It extends it for two years more. It is recommended to us by the Bureau of Naturalization and has the approval of all of the associations of veterans.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. DILL. Why does the Senator limit it to two years more? Why does he not take off the limitation?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Because we feel that there ought to be every incentive for prompt action; that if a man is so indifferent that he does not act within four years after the privilege is given him, he ought not to have the privilege. The reason for extending it, the additional two years, is that the Bureau of Naturalization has several hundred applications now pending upon which they have been unable to act.

Mr. DILL. I am in entire sympathy with the proposal to extend it for two years, but I think it is indefensible that the law should have been passed originally in the way it was. I do not, for my own part, see any reason why there should be any limitation. We will be called upon in two years to do the same thing again. A man who went into the Army during the World War and served and got an honorable discharge, ought to be permitted to apply to become a citizen at any time. I do not see why any man who did not go into the Army, such as the men we have here in the Senate—except, of course, the Senator from Pennsylvania—should for one minute feel that a man who gave his service in time of war should not be permitted to become a citizen at any time he saw fit.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I feel the same way, but I should like to have him do it as soon as possible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

COAST GUARD COMMISSIONED PERSONNEL

The bill (H. R. 17060) to readjust the commissioned personnel of the Coast Guard, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after July 1, 1929, the total number of commissioned officers on the active list, regular and temporary combined (exclusive of the commandant and commissioned warrant officers and additional numbers that have been authorized by law), authorized in the Coast Guard shall be 588, consisting of 526 line officers distributed in the proportion of 4 in the grade of captain, to 8 in the grade of commander, to 15 in the grade of lieutenant commander, to 30 in the grade of lieutenant, to 43 in the grades of lieutenant (junior grade) and ensign, inclusive; and of 1 engineer in chief, 8 captains (engineering), 16 commanders (engineering), and 18 lieutenant commanders (engineering), and of 5 constructors, and 14 district commanders: Provided, That the number of temporary commissioned officers, not above the rank of lieutenant, within the total of commissioned officers herein authorized shall be as the President shall determine: And provided further, That notwithstanding the number of officers herein authorized in the grades of captain (engineering) and commander (engineering), respectively, an engineer officer may be promoted, subject to examination as provided by law, to either of these grades at the same time as a line officer of the same length of total service in the Coast Guard is promoted to either of the corresponding grades in the line.

SEC. 2. That each vacancy occurring at the bottom of the list of commissioned engineer officers on the active list after July 1, 1929, shall operate to reduce by one the total number of engineer officers and to increase by one the total number of line officers authorized by section 1 of this act.

SEC. 3. In making any computation required or authorized by or pursuant to this act there shall be excluded from consideration those officers carried by law as additional numbers, and whenever a final fraction of one-half or more occurs the whole number next above shall be regarded as the authorized number.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, is hereby authorized to furnish an escort, not to exceed one person, to the place of burial for the body of an officer or enlisted man who has lost his life in the Coast Guard. Such expenses as are incurred for this purpose shall be paid from the proper appropriation.

SEC. 5. That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to reduce the rank, pay, or allowances of any commissioned officer of the Coast Guard as now provided by law.

SEC. 6. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I think I should explain the bill. It is a very necessary bill. The bill has passed the House of Representatives—I think unanimously or by unanimous consent. It has been examined very carefully by practically all the members of the Committee on Commerce, and they are all in favor of it. The bill is recommended by the Budget and is, as I said, pointed out by the Secretary of the Treasury as being very necessary.

We have now for the Coast Guard 340 regular commissioned officers. We provided also, I think, for 110 temporary officers. Those temporary officers have no assurance of permanency at all; they have no retirement privileges; they have no benefits under the compensation act. As a result the temporary force is not nearly full. My recollection is that the report shows that there are probably 59 vacancies in the temporary force.

Ten cutters were authorized about three years ago. Four of those cutters have been built; one is nearly completed; appropriations have been made for three more; another one will probably soon be constructed. Those cutters will be without regular officers to man them.

I will read just a few extracts from the Secretary's letter urging the passage of this bill, which explains the necessity for it. In the first place, I will read from the House report just one paragraph:

While the task of preventing smuggling of liquor and narcotics from the sea is one of the difficult tasks of the Coast Guard, it is only one of the tasks. The preservation of life and property from the perils of the sea is the great work of the Coast Guard. Its importance can scarcely be overstated. In this great work the Coast Guard has a record of honorable achievements which in the opinion of the committee is unsurpassed by any branch of the Government service.

Let me say here that from time to time I have received letters with reference to the conditions affecting the Coast Guard, especially in Alaska—naturally I, rather than other Senators, receive letters from that Territory—pointing out the very great necessity for additional Coast Guard vessels in that region. It has not been very long since one or two, if not more, vessels were lost or nearly lost, being disabled, and no assistance could be rendered to them or was not rendered to them for a good while, largely because of the lack of Coast Guard service. Of course it is true the waters and channels of Alaska are so extensive that it probably will be a long time until adequate service shall be rendered there, but they are in great need of service now.

Secretary Mellon, among other things in his letter—I will not take time to read it all—says:

The greatest difficulty that confronts the Coast Guard to-day, as regards efficient and economical administration, is an acute shortage of commissioned officers and the fact that the commissioned officers are now, under existing law, divided into two classes, namely, officers of the regular service and officers holding temporary commissions. It is believed that a résumé of recent legislation with respect to the commissioned officers of the Coast Guard will be helpful in making clear the present condition that exists.

And he points that out. I will not read all of that portion of his letter.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What increase in the Coast Guard Service is contemplated by the pending measure?

Mr. JONES. There are 340 regular officers now, and this bill contemplates raising that number to 589 and doing away with the temporary officers. It is expected that the force will not reach the maximum until 1934. The Secretary further says:

There have been so many difficulties connected with this policy—

That is, of having temporary officers—of having temporary officers that the Coast Guard has practically stopped all efforts to obtain more of them, preferring to struggle along as best it can awaiting legislation to remedy the situation. On July 1 next there will probably be 56 vacancies in the temporary officers authorized, which means that this number of officers is practically lost to the service.

Then he closes his letter as follows:

I am convinced that unless suitable legislation be promptly enacted to readjust the commissioned personnel of the Coast Guard the time will shortly come when it will be impossible for the service properly to carry on the duties with which it is charged, because it will not have sufficient officers to do the work. This bill has my entire approval, and should you find it consistent with your own ideas, I shall be grateful if you will introduce the measure and give to its favorable consideration by Congress your personal attention.

There is a brief outline of the necessity for this legislation. It seems to be very desirable from the standpoint of securing efficient and economical service on the part of the Coast Guard for the performance of the duties imposed upon it by law.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington permit a question?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator whether other countries, particularly Great Britian, regard the Coast Guard Service as an adjunct to the Navy; and whether they give the same preferment, have the same proportionate number of officers from the lower grades to admirals for which this bill provides?

Mr. JONES. I will say frankly to the Senator that I am not prepared to answer that question. It does not appear to be discussed in the Secretary's letter, and that contains all the information that I have had an opportunity to obtain. I do know, however, that the Coast Guard is made a part of our Navy, and, in time of war especially, becomes an actual part of our naval force. Of course, during peace it is rendering dangerous service very generally.

Mr. KING. It is obvious that this bill contemplates nearly doubling the number of officers of the Coast Guard.

Mr. JONES. No; I think the Senator is mistaken in that. There are now 340 regular officers and 110 temporary officers, who are considered necessary and have been heretofore provided for. The total is to be increased to 589, but at the same time the temporary officers are discontinued, so that the bill really only contemplates an actual increase of a little over a hundred more than the total of temporary and regular force at the present time.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator what was the number of regular officers in the Coast Guard Service in 1915, 1916, and 1917, prior to the enactment of the Volstead Act?

Mr. JONES. I do not remember the exact figures. I think that probably 300 or 340 represented the number before we provided the temporary force of officers.

Mr. KING. Then, a very considerable part of the personnel, and a large part of the officers of the Coast Guard, are made necessary by reason of the enforcement of the Volstead Act?

Mr. JONES. I think that is true. We have imposed that duty upon them.

Mr. KING. And the cost now is approximately $50,000,000 annually for the Coast Guard.

Mr. JONES. That includes the building of cutters and all that sort of thing. Of course, we do not build cutters every year, but the other activities of the Coast Guard also have been very greatly increased during the last few years.

Mr. KING. Assume that we make greater progress toward sobriety and the observance of the Volstead Act during the next 10 or 15 years than has characterized our progress during the past 5 or 6 years, what steps are being taken or will be taken under existing or prospective legislation to bring the Coast Guard Service down again to a normal peace-time basis?

Mr. JONES. I will say when that time comes we will provide legislation to meet that situation.

Mr. KING. Having by legislation created all these positions, are the officers not in the service for life?

Mr. JONES. These particular officers may be in the service for life, but we can reduce the personnel afterwards by legislation, of course.

Mr. KING. The officers will be in the service for life, and will be entitled to pensions and retirement?

Mr. JONES. That is true.

Mr. KING. So that this bill adds greatly to the annual expenses of the Government?

Mr. JONES. I will say to the Senator, however, that with increased commerce and increased development, even though there should be a diminution of the work in other branches of the services, the necessities will still, I think, make necessary whatever increase may be provided under this proposed law, but the Coast Guard will probably be in a condition so that we will not have to make a further increase.

Then, as I said a while ago, we ought to take better care of Alaska, independent of the Volstead Act, because of the actual necessities that exist there at all times and the increase of local commerce there.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator regard it as necessary to create the same grades of officers in the Coast Guard as we do in the Navy, including captains and admirals? My recollection of the Coast Guard Service in other countries is that they do not confer upon the commissioned personnel in the service the same rank, the same pay and allowances as are provided for the members of the Coast Guard Service in the United States.

Mr. JONES. There is not an equality in that respect in this bill. As a matter of fact, one section of the bill, the original section 4, was stricken out in the House, that did, I think, contemplate a little change in the two highest officers, but that was stricken out and left out of the bill.

Mr. KING. What is the highest grade attained in the Coast Guard?

Mr. JONES. They have the rank of admiral. I think the admiral of the Coast Guard is the commandant now, and this bill does not affect that.

Mr. KING. I notice that in this bill we make substantially the same provision as to the number of officers in the aggregate—the number of captains, the number of lieutenant commanders, the number of admirals—that would be provided in the Navy in proportion.

Mr. JONES. That may be true.

Mr. KING. The same rank, the same grade, the same number; so that we are creating out of the Coast Guard a navy, with all of the attachments and ornaments that belong to a navy.

Mr. JONES. They perform a very valuable service.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DALE S. RICE

The bill (H. R. 14089) for the relief of Dale S. Rice was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

DECLARATIONS OF INTENTION IN NATURALIZATION PROCEEDINGS

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Chair about reports of committees that were made as late as yesterday? Are they on the calendar for to-night?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The understanding of the Chair is that all reports submitted, up to and including the recess of yesterday, are now included on the Calendar.

Mr. COPELAND. Even though they are not printed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that they are all printed.

Mr. COPELAND. It so happens that I myself presented a report from the Committee on Immigration——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator have the number.

Mr. COPELAND. I do not recall it at the moment. It is the Sabath bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the Senator from New York refers to House bill 16440 relating to declarations of intention in naturalization proceedings, that bill has been passed with an amendment presented by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED].

Mr. COPELAND. Was it a satisfactory amendment?

Mr. JOHNSON. I think so. It related to veterans.

Mr. COPELAND. Very well.

ROCKY MOUNTAIN NATIONAL PARK, COLO.

The bill (H. R. 17101) to accept the cession by the State of Colorado of exclusive jurisdiction over the lands embraced within the Rocky Mountain National Park, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I invite the attention of the Senator from Colorado to the fact that I have had a number of letters from his State in regard to this bill.

Mr. BLEASE. Let the bill go over.

Mr. WATERMAN. I hope the Senator will withdraw the objection.

Mr. BLEASE. We are operating under a unanimous-consent agreement; it is now 25 minutes after 10, and the agreement was to consider unobjected bills.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina object?

Mr. BLEASE. I will withdraw the objection if the Senator from Colorado wishes me to, but if we are going to have discussion of the bills we might just as well do away with the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. KING. The unanimous-consent agreement does not provide that a Senator may not make an inquiry regarding a bill.

Mr. WATERMAN. Mr. President, this is a bill accepting the cession by the State of Colorado of a large tract of land known as the Rocky Mountain National Park. It is satisfactory to the Government, to the Interior Department, and to the people of my State. The matter has been held in abeyance for some 15 years, and we have been trying to arrive at an agreement with reference to this cession. The agreement which has now been reached is satisfactory to every one who is interested in the matter, and I hope the bill may be allowed to pass.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of the act of the Legislature of the State of Colorado, approved February 19, 1929, ceding to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the territory embraced and included within the Rocky Mountain National Park, are hereby accepted, and sole and exclusive jurisdiction is hereby assumed by the United States over such territory, saving, however, to the State of Colorado the right to serve civil or criminal process within the limits of the aforesaid park in suits or prosecutions for or on account of rights acquired, obligations incurred, or crimes committed outside of said park; and saving further to the said State the right to tax persons and corporations, their franchises and property on the lands included in said tract; and saving also to the persons residing in said park now or hereafter the right to vote at all elections held within the county or counties in which said tracts are situated; and saving to all persons residing within said park upon lands now privately owned within said park access to and from such lands, and all rights and privileges as citizens of the State of Colorado; and saving to the people of Colorado all vested, appropriated, and existing water rights and rights of way connected therewith, including all existing irrigation conduits and ditches. All the laws applicable to places under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States shall have force and effect in said park. All fugitives from justice taking refuge in said park shall be subject to the same laws as refugees from justice found in the State of Colorado.

SEC. 2. That said park shall constitute a part of the United States judicial district for the State of Colorado, and the district court of the United States in and for said district shall have jurisdiction of all offenses committed within said boundaries.

SEC. 3. That if any offense shall be committed in the Rocky Mountain National Park, which offense is not prohibited or the punishment for which is not specifically provided for by any law of the United States, the offender shall be subject to the same punishment as the laws of the State of Colorado in force at the time of the commission of the offense may provide for a like offense in said State; and no subsequent repeal of any such law of the State of Colorado shall affect any prosecution for said offense committed within said park.

SEC. 4. That all hunting or the killing, wounding, or capturing at any time of any wild bird or animal, except dangerous animals when it is necessary to prevent them from destroying human lives or inflicting personal injury, is prohibited within the limits of said park; nor shall any fish be taken out of the waters of the park in any other way than by hook and line, and then only at such seasons and in such times and manner as may be directed by the Secretary of the Interior. That the Secretary of the Interior shall make and publish such general rules and regulations as he may deem necessary and proper for the management and care of the park and for the protection of the property therein, especially for the preservation from injury or spoliation of all timber, natural curiosities, or wonderful objects within said park, and for the protection of the animals and birds in the park from capture or destruction, and to prevent their being frightened or driven from the park; and he shall make rules and regulations governing the taking of fish from the streams or lakes in the park. Possession within said park of the dead bodies, or any part thereof, of any wild bird or animal shall be prima facie evidence that the person or persons having the same are guilty of violating this act. Any person or persons, or stage or express company, or railway company, who knows or has reason to believe that they were taken or killed contrary to the provisions of this act and who receives for transportation any of said animals, birds, or fish so killed, caught, or taken, or who shall violate any of the provisions of this act or any rule or regulation that may be promulgated by the Secretary of the Interior with reference to the management and care of the park or for the protection of the property therein, for the preservation from injury or spoliation of timber, natural curiosities, or wonderful objects within said park, or for the protection of the animals, birds, or fish in the park, or who shall within said park commit any damage, injury, or spoliation to or upon any building, fence, hedge, gate, guidepost, tree, wood, underwood, timber, garden, crops, vegetables, plants, land, springs, natural curiosities, or other matter or thing growing or being thereon or situated therein, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be subject to a fine of not more than $500 or imprisonment not exceeding six months, or both, and be adjudged to pay all costs of the proceedings.

SEC. 5. That all guns, traps, teams, horses, or means of transportation of every nature or description used by any person or persons within said park limits when engaged in killing, trapping, ensnaring, or capturing such wild beasts, birds, or animals shall be forfeited to the United States and may be seized by the officers in said park and held pending the prosecution of any person or persons arrested under charge of violating the provisions of this act, and upon conviction under this act of such person or persons using said guns, traps, teams, horses, or other means of transportation, such forfeiture shall be adjudicated as a penalty in addition to the other punishment provided in this act. Such forfeited property shall be disposed of and accounted for by and under the authority of the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 6. That the United States District Court for the State of Colorado shall appoint a commissioner who shall reside in the park and who shall have jurisdiction to hear and act upon all complaints made of any violations of law or of the rules and regulations made by the Secretary of the Interior for the government of the park and for the protection of the animals, birds, and fish, and objects of interest therein, and for other purposes authorized by this act.

Such commissioner shall have power, upon sworn information, to issue process in the name of the United States for the arrest of any person charged with the commission of any misdemeanor, or charged with a violation of the rules and regulations, or with a violation of any of the provisions of this act prescribed for the government of said park and for the protection of the animals, birds, and fish in said park, and to try the person so charged, and, if found guilty, to impose punishment and to adjudge the forfeiture prescribed.

In all cases of conviction an appeal shall lie from the judgment of said commissioner to the United States District Court for the State of Colorado, and the United States district court in said district shall prescribe the rules of procedure and practice for said commissioner in the trial of cases and for appeal to said United States district court.

SEC. 7. That such commissioner shall also have power to issue process as hereinbefore provided for the arrest of any person charged with the commission within said boundaries of any criminal offense not covered by the provision of section 4 of this act to hear the evidence introduced, and if he is of opinion that probable cause is shown for holding the person so charged for trial shall cause each person to be safely conveyed to a secure place of confinement within the jurisdiction of the United States District Court for the State of Colorado, and certify a transcript of the record of his proceedings and the testimony in the case to said court, which court shall have jurisdiction of the case: Provided, That the said commissioner shall grant bail in all cases bailable under the laws of the United States or of said State.

SEC. 8. That all process issued by the commissioner shall be directed to the marshal of the United States for the district of Colorado, but nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent the arrest by any officer or employee of the Government or any person employed by the United States in the policing of said reservation within said boundaries without process of any person taken in the act of violating the law or this act or the regulations prescribed by the said Secretary as aforesaid.

SEC. 9. That the commissioner provided for in this act shall be paid an annual salary as appropriated for by Congress, payable quarterly: Provided, That the said commissioner shall reside within the exterior boundaries of said Rocky Mountain National Park, at a place to be designated by the court making such appointment: And provided further, That all fees, costs, and expenses collected by the commissioner shall be disposed of as provided in section 11 of this act.

JOHN F. O'NEIL

The bill (H. R. 5995) for the relief of John F. O'Neil was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts subsequently said: Mr. President, in my absence some action was taken upon Order of Business No. 2087, House bill 5995, for the relief of John F. O'Neil. I ask unanimous consent to have it taken up now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection was made.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Will the Senator from Utah permit me to make a statement about it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to recur to the consideration of House bill 5995, to which objection was made by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I withhold the objection for the present. May I say that the report indicates, however, that there is no merit in the case?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, this bill authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to appoint John F. O'Neil, jr., a carpenter in the United States Naval Reserve Force and place him upon the retired list with three-quarters pay of his grade, and that said John F. O'Neil shall not by the passage of this act be entitled to back pay or allowances.

O'Neil while a carpenter in the United States Naval Reserve was serving on board the U. S. S. Lakemoor when that vessel was torpedoed April 11, 1918. He suffered severe injuries, being in the sea for several hours; he was ordered to appear before a board of medical survey, which board recommended that he be discharged from the Naval Reserve Force. Thereupon O'Neil was honorably discharged from the service on July 11, 1919.

On June 4, 1920, an act was passed providing that all officers of the Naval Reserve Force who have heretofore incurred or who may hereafter incur physical disability in line of duty shall be eligible for retirement under the same conditions as now provided by law for officers of the regular Navy who have incurred physical disability in line of duty.

If O'Neil had not at that time been honorably discharged from the service because of his physical disabilities he would have immediately received the benefits of this law.

This act seeks to give him such benefits.

In fact, in 1921 O'Neil was authorized to appear before a medical survey, and that board then ordered that he be ordered before a retiring board. He was recommended for retirement, but due to the fact that he had been discharged from the Naval Reserve Force and was no longer an officer in the naval service, he was ineligible for retirement under the act of June 4, 1920.

If he had not been honorably discharged in 1919 for serious injuries in line of duty and had remained in the service beyond the 4th of June, 1920, he would have then been eligible for retirement, and it is probable that a Navy retiring board would have recommended him for retirement.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I withdraw my objection, with the understanding that if, upon further examination to-morrow, I desire to move to reconsider, the Senator will consent to that.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I appreciate that very much.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Senate will recur to Order of Business No. 2087, House bill 5995, for the relief of John F. O'Neil.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the bill (H. R. 13440) for the relief of Howard P. Milligan.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, do I understand that the Senate committee has already reported an identical bill?

Mr. BLAINE. The Senate committee has reported an identical bill.

Mr. KING. What is the purpose of the bill?

Mr. BLAINE. The bill is to authorize the President to reinstate an Army officer who had been removed on account of some social difficulties between himself and his superior.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BOARD OF VISITORS TO PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, the other evening, when we reached Order of Business 1771, House bill 16877, the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] objected to its consideration, and asked that it be explained. I have had a conversation with him, and he has authorized me to say that he has no objection to the bill. I ask unanimous consent that it may now be considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Let the bill be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the bill (H. R. 16877) providing for the biennial appointment of a board of visitors to inspect and report upon the government and conditions in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think that bill had better go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. BINGHAM subsequently said: Mr. President, the Senator from Utah has agreed to withdraw his objection to the passage of House bill 16877 on condition that if, after looking into it to-morrow, he desires to move that it be reconsidered, that motion will be made.

Mr. KING I want to state it accurately. I am opposed to this bill, and I think it is very unwise. I think these junketing trips—and that is what they will amount to in the end—are not profitable either to the United States or to the Territories and colonies that we are seeking to incorporate under the flag. However, upon consultation with representatives of the Filipinos, if they desire this legislation I shall abate my opposition; but to-morrow morning, if I desire to move to reconsider, it is to be understood that unanimous consent shall be given, and that in the meantime the bill shall not be transmitted to the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Senate bill will recur to the consideration of House bill 16877, Order of Business 1771. Without objection, the Senator from Utah reserves the right to move to reconsider; and, without objection, the bill will not be transmitted to the House.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

UNEMPLOYMENT IN THE UNITED STATES

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I desire to submit a report (No. 2072) from the Committee on Education and Labor, pursuant to Senate Resolution 219, providing for an analysis and appraisal of reports on unemployment, and systems for prevention and relief thereof. I ask that the report and evidence be printed as a public document. There is no legislation required and no bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the report will be received; and, without objection, the report and the evidence will be printed as a public document.

NATIONAL INSTITUTE OF HEALTH

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to consider Senate bill 4518, to create a National Institute of Health.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the calendar number?

Mr. RANSDELL. It is Order of Business 1322. The bill has been fully considered, and I do not ask to debate it if we can not take it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4518) to establish and operate a National Institute of Health, to create a system of fellowships in said institute, and to authorize the Government to accept donations for use in ascertaining the cause, prevention, and cure of disease affecting human beings, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana offers certain amendments, which will be stated.

The amendments were, on page 2, line 4, after the word "or," to insert "when appropriations are made therefor"; on page 2, line 13, after the word "advisable," to strike out "There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be adequate to carry out the provisions of this act"; on page 2, after line 16, to insert: "The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to submit to Congress not later than December 2, 1929, plans and estimates of appropriations necessary to carry out adequately the provisions of this act"; and on page 2, line 20, before the word "problems," to strike out "the fundamental" and insert "all," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to establish and operate a national institute of health under the jurisdiction of his department and the administrative control of the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, which shall be devoted to scientific research in the problems of the diseases of man and matters pertaining to health. The Hygienic Laboratory shall hereafter be known as the national institute of health. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to utilize the site now occupied by the Hygienic Laboratory and the land adjacent thereto owned by the Government and available for this purpose, or when appropriations are made therefor to acquire by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, in or near the District of Columbia, and to erect thereon suitable and adequate buildings, including furniture and equipment for the use of such institute. In the administration and operation of this institute the Surgeon General shall select persons who show unusual aptitude in science. The Surgeon General, with approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may make such rules and regulations for the government and administration of such institute as he deems advisable. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to submit to Congress not later than December 2, 1929, plans and estimates of appropriations necessary to carry out adequately the provisions of this act.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to accept, unconditionally, on behalf of the United States, gifts by will or otherwise for study, investigation, and research in all problems of the diseases of man and matters pertaining thereto. Any such gifts shall be held in trusts and shall be invested by the Secretary of the Treasury in securities of the United States, and the income thereof shall be administered by the Surgeon General, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, for the purposes indicated in this act. The Surgeon General is authorized to establish fellowships in the national institute of health, and utilize the proceeds thereof in aid of individual scientists who have demonstrated or give promise of marked proficiency in research and investigations relating to the diseases of man. Donations of $500,000 or over in aid of research will be acknowledged permanently by the establishment within the institute of suitable memorials to the donors.

SEC. 3. Individual scientists designated by the Surgeon General to receive fellowships may be appointed for duty in the National Institute of Health established by this act. During the period of such fellowship, these appointees shall hold appointments under regulations promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and shall be subject to administrative regulations for the conduct of the Public Health Service. Scientists so selected may likewise be designated for the prosecution of investigations in other localities and institutions in this and other countries during the term of their fellowships.

SEC. 4. The Secretary of the Treasury, upon the recommendation of the Surgeon General, is authorized (1) without regard to the classification act of 1923, to designate the titles and fix the compensation of the necessary scientific personnel; (2) in accordance with the civil service laws to appoint, and in accordance with the classification act of 1923, fix the compensation of such clerical and other assistants; and (3) to make such expenditures (including expenditures for personal services and rent at the seat of government, for books of reference, periodicals, and exhibits, and for printing and binding) as he deems necessary for the proper administration of such institution.

SEC. 5. The facilities of the institute shall from time to time be made available to bona fide health authorities of States, counties, or municipalities for purposes of instruction and investigation.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FRIDAY, March 1, 1929

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We give thanks to Thee, Blessed Father, for all the supplies of love and grace; we praise Thee for the bountiful hand that gives them, and may we strive to use them for Thy glory. Let not the burdens of care, the vicissitudes of business, or any disappointments daze or leave us uncertain as to the performance of our duty. Be our sovereign guide, our bread of life, and the rock of our salvation; we find in Thee the true life, calm and safe. O Lord unsettle the foundations of every iniquitous agency, put to naught every wicked thing, and bless the endeavors of those who seek the good with simplicity and earnestness. Direct us to harken unto Thy statutes, walk in the ways of Thy commandments, and keep our expectant lives toward the rising sun of hope and promise. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President of the Senate be authorized to appoint three Senators and the Speaker of the House to appoint three Members of the House of Representatives to cooperate with the New Bern Historical Society and a committee of the North Carolina Legislature in the observance of certain historical events which occurred during the colonial and Revolutionary period at New Bern, N. C.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, we are now definitely given to understand that an extra session will be convened in April to consider farm-relief legislation and tariff readjustments to make such legislation effective. It is one of the most heartening assurances that could possibly be given. When Mr. Hoover made his now historic announcement that if elected he would call an extra session of Congress to deal with the agricultural problem, many considered it merely a campaign statement made in the heat of an unprecedented political contest and involving no definite obligation. And that conclusion seemed particularly plausible in view of the condition precedent with which he prefaced it—provided the subject is not disposed of at the short session.

That members of the candidate's own party found room for that interpretation is shown by the fact that from the first day of this session until recently, when the intention of the President elect became too obvious to be longer misunderstood, administration leaders in both House and Senate, the Secretary of Agriculture, and President Coolidge himself have insisted that some species of farm bill be rushed through before March 4 in order to relieve the incoming administration from any embarrassment incident to requests for the redemption of that promise. Even some Members of the House, who had borne the heat and burden of the day in the fight for the McNary-Haugen bill, were temporarily stampeded and joined in the hue and cry for "some kind of a bill."

But it is now evident that Mr. Hoover meant what he said; that his campaign pledge to the farmers of the country was not merely "molasses to catch flies" but was made with a comprehensive understanding of the critical problems with which agriculture has been struggling for the last eight years and with a sincere desire to assist in their early and permanent solution. At least, we must accept that view until some proof is adduced to the contrary.

How accurately Mr. Hoover interprets, and how completely he accepts the farmer's point of view in calling an extra session, is shown by reference to the resolutions adopted by the American Farm Bureau Federation at its annual convention at Chicago last December. The Farm Bureau said at that time:

Surplus control legislation and agricultural tariffs can not be made major features of the second session of the Seventieth Congress, since time is not available in a short session of Congress adequately to correlate and dispose of these subjects in the proper manner. Both such major legislative projects should be considered at an extra session of the Seventy-first Congress, which we confidently expect will be called soon after adjournment of the Seventieth Congress.

It is one of the hopeful signs of the times that after eight years of delay and obstruction we are to have at last an administration which proposes to consider respectfully the recommendations of the farm organizations in the formulation of farm legislation. And still more encouraging is the fact that not only Mr. Hoover but practically every Representative returned from a rural district, whether Democrat or Republican, also pledged himself during the campaign to an earnest effort to place agriculture on a plane of economic equality with industry and labor.

It is not a partisan question. The McNary-Haugen bill, which in the last three Congresses was the acid test of farm interest, was supported by practically the same proportion of members of both political parties. Mr. Secretary Henry C. Wallace, unquestionably the greatest Secretary of Agriculture to hold that high office under any administration, ardently championed the principles embodied in that bill, while Mr. Secretary Jardine has just as ardently opposed them. There are men on both sides of the aisle ready and anxious to cooperate with Mr. Hoover in practical and effective farm legislation. And there are men on either side of the aisle who if they had their way would have Congress adjourn and go home and stay there until the regular session next December, leaving the farmer in the same precarious situation he occupies to-day. It is not a question of party polity. Friends of farm relief on this side as well as on that side of the aisle are ready to cooperate whole-heartedly and unreservedly with Mr. Hoover in the solution of what he termed in his speech in St. Louis last November—

The most urgent economic problem in our Nation to-day.

And as serious as the problem was when Mr. Hoover made that sweeping statement, it is even more serious and more urgent to-day. Every year for the last eight years professional optimists and administration apologists have assured us that the agricultural depression was past. Every year they have told us that farm conditions were improving. No report emanating from the Department of Agriculture; no bulletin issued by the business associations, commercial agencies, or industrial organizations of the country; no financial summary carried by the metropolitan papers has been complete without an enthusiastic deduction that farm conditions were growing steadily better. Continuously throughout the past eight years trade journals and political and commercial publicists representing interests profiting at the expense of the farmer have busily disseminated trade reports, news articles, editorials, cartoons, and other propaganda insisting that farm conditions were back to normal and the industry was again on a basis of rapidly increasing returns.

Let us look at these rosy reports of farm prosperity in the cold light of statistics compiled by the most unsympathetic agency in the world—the United States Department of Agriculture. What do the actual balance sheets show?

A summary just issued by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics shows that since 1919, while the index number representing industrial wages has risen 52 points, the index number representing the price of agricultural commodities has fallen 29 points. The rise of industrial wages and the fall of agricultural income have been simultaneous throughout these eight years, and at the close of December, 1928, this phenomenal drop in farm prices and this unprecedented rise in industrial wages are still in operation. Union labor is still getting more and more and the farmer is still getting less and less. During the year 1928, just reported, wages have risen from an index number of 230 to 237, an increase of 7 points, and farm prices have fallen from the index number of 137 to 134, a loss of 3 points. Instead of improving every year, as these prosperity howlers would have us believe, the agricultural situation grows continuously worse.

And during these eight years, while the farmer's income has steadily declined, his cost of living and his costs of production have just as persistently increased. Farm taxes rose from an index number of 130 in 1919 to 254 in 1927, and in the last 12 months the price of essential commodities bought by the farmer rose from 154 to 157. In other words, the less the farmer receives the more he is required to pay; the less he has the more is exacted of him.

To him that hath shall be given; and from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath.

Land values representing the farmer's capital investment have declined without a pause for the last eight years and are still declining. The farmer's share in the national income has been shrinking for eight years and is still shrinking. The farm-mortgage debt, the number of farm foreclosures, and the number of rural bank failures have been just as steadily increasing and are increasing to-day. And this at a time when labor and industry are prospering as they have never prospered before.

Note the contrast. The total farm assets of the United States decreased $30,000,000,000 between 1920 and 1925, while the total industrial assets of the United States increased $56,000,000,000 during the same period. These are official figures based on the returns from the 1925 census. Interest on the farmers' capital investment declined from 4.3 per cent for the year 1925–26 to 2 per cent for the year 1926–27, while average earnings of all corporations on total capital investments, water and all, for that year were 13 per cent. Farm lands, after declining every year since 1919, involving a total loss in excess of $21,000,000,000—as incredible as that may seem—and after apparently reaching bedrock prices at the close of 1927, further declined 2 per cent in 1928.

And the loss continues. The Department of Agriculture reported on February 4 of this year that the decline in the general level of farm prices had continued over into 1929, and that the index figure representing farm prices fell from 134 on December 1, 1928, to 133 on January 15 last. On February 4, 1929, the index number was still lower. And this after eight years of falling markets.

The desperate plight in which the farmer finds himself—through no fault of his own—is all the more striking by contrast with industrial conditions. The New York City Bank in its summary for 1928, issued last week, says:

Never before has a nation made such progress in the accumulation of wealth in so short a time as has the United States since 1921.

And that is undoubtedly true; but what about the farmer during this marvelous period of universal prosperity? During that period the farmers of the country suffered the unparalleled loss of one-third of their property values, one-third of their invested capital assets. Suppose the railroads or the banks or any other industry had suffered the loss of one-third of their capital assets during those eight years. Can you imagine Congress sitting here and discussing the subject as placidly and as impotently as we have discussed the farmer's loss these last eight years? Carrying the analogy still further, the United States Bureau of Internal Revenue after tabulating the income statistics of the Nation announces that labor and industry are to-day enjoying the highest standards of living ever attained in this or any other country. So emphatic a statement from such a source merits more than passing attention. And it is amply supported by reports from every other authoritative source. Industrial wages per capita are higher and hours of labor per day and per week are shorter in America to-day than ever before in the history of any people or any country since industrial statistics have been tabulated. But the economic position of the farmer, the purchasing power of his products, the wages received for his labor, and the return on his invested capital have declined year by year until the standard of living on the American farm has fallen to the irreducible minimum.

Now, let us not mistake the farmer's position. The farmer has no criticism to make of either labor or industry. The farmer believes in high wages and high prices. He would not take a penny from the wages of labor or from the returns of industry. But he does contend that if he must pay labor a high wage for its services and industry a high price for its products he, too, is entitled to a living wage for his labor and a fair price for his products.

He believes that a dollar invested in farm land and equipment is as sacred as a dollar invested in factories, public utilities, or rolling stock, and that an hour's honest labor on the farm is as much entitled to remuneration as an hour's labor in the shop or on the railroad. He maintains that if Congress has enacted laws under which labor has raised wages, and laws under which industry has increased prices, he, likewise, is entitled to legislation giving him the same right and placing him in a plane of economic equality with both labor and industry. He has been in dire need of that legislation for the last eight years, and he is in more desperate need of it now than ever before. For as drastic as has been the decline in farm assets reported by Federal agencies, such reports do not yet represent the full measure of the farmer's loss. Not only have his lands declined in market value, but their actual and intrinsic worth has depreciated even more rapidly through his lack of means with which to maintain them. Farm improvements which have required generations of successful farming to build are falling into irremediable decay. Lack of money with which to supply livestock, legumes, lime, and fertilizer; lack of respite from fixed charges in which to rotate crops; lack of labor to protect from erosion and predatory pests; the loss not only of surface fertility but of irreplaceable subsoils are alike combining to desolate vast areas of once fertile farm lands beyond hope of redemption.

As you travel through the country and see farms once prosperous and productive now washed and torn by erosion and neglect, gullied and depleted beyond possibility of reclamation, you realize that here in America we have accomplished by legislative discrimination what has been effected in Russia by revolution and confiscation. In prospering the city at the expense of the country, in denying the farmer the means with which to maintain his land we are exploiting and consuming just as effectively and just as ruthlessly the agricultural assets of our own country. In practically every community there are farms which have been so completely desolated in the last eight years that no amount of intelligent care and no expenditure of money can bring them back to the state of productivity they occupied in 1919. They have been permanently charged off the books of our national assets.

And farm resources have been still further impaired. In 1919 real estate was the highest form of collateral the farmer could offer in applying to his bank for credit. Notes secured by mortgages on farm land constituted the safest and most approved type of investment in which banks and insurance companies kept their surplus funds. To-day land is no longer acceptable collateral. There are few rural banks at which loans can be secured on farm lands. State finance departments frown on real-estate loans and sharply criticize their acceptance. Insurance companies have definitely withdrawn from the land-mortgage market. And the curtailment of farming operations through failure of the farmer to secure loans to tide him over the crop season or feeding period is the rule rather than the exception. Legislative discrimination has not only destroyed farm wealth and reduced farm income, but it has just as effectively depleted farm credit.

And having exploited farm lands and farm credits we are now beginning the exploitation of the farmers themselves. So stringent are farm conditions that the average family of the Central West is no longer able to provide standard educational advantages for its children. The enrollment and attendance of agricultural schools has everywhere declined. Young men and young women who should be taking agricultural courses and preparing themselves for the scientific management of the industry—farm boys and girls who should be in training for social and industrial leadership in agricultural communities—are denied that opportunity because agriculture is bankrupt. Too often the able and ambitious are being forced into other industries and the incompetent and ne'er-do-well are left on the farm. It is not merely a farm disaster; it is a national disaster. It is a situation which must inevitably be reflected throughout the land. No nation can starve an industry without eventually feeling the effects of that discrimination in every artery of trade. And agriculture has been slowly starving year by year for eight years. Not only has she failed to make a reasonable profit in a period of extraordinary profits for all other industries; not only has she lost one-third of all she possessed, but the loss has been spiritual and ethical as well as financial and material. The very calling is being stigmatized. For the last eight years it has been an economic anathema. Although from earliest times it has been the noblest profession to which men may aspire, under present conditions it is becoming synonymous with poverty and provincialism.

It is this situation—a situation growing daily more urgent—which Mr. Hoover proposes to make the first care of his administration. By what method he hopes to alleviate that situation has been the subject of much speculation and surmise. Up to this time he has made no announcement as to his personal views, but it may be pertinent to note the viewpoint from which he analyzed a similar problem some years ago in establishing salary schedules at a great university of which he was trustee. In a magazine article published in 1918 describing the incident the narrator relates:

> His first question was: "What is the figure below which a professor can not maintain himself on a basis which will not lower his efficiency in his work or his dignity in the community?" We finally agreed on a figure. "Well," said Hoover, "that must be the minimum salary."

If the President elect will approach the pending problem from that sympathetic point of view; if he will advocate a standard of living for the farm commensurate with that enjoyed by other industries, and measured by such standards of efficiency as those prescribed by labor unions and trade guilds, he will have taken a long step towards its solution. In the last eight years the standard of living in the American city has risen by leaps and bounds, while on the farm it has dropped tragically. The farmer, staggered by the collapse of his own prices, finds himself saddled with the added costs of supporting the continually advancing standards of living demanded by labor and industry. In this extremity, ground between the upper and nether millstones of a decreasing income on the one hand and an increasing budget on the other, the farmer is not demanding a lower standard of living for the rest of the country. He is not asking for the repeal of the transportation act, the immigration law, or the protective tariff. He is not suggesting a lower scale of union wages, decreased dividends on stocks, or lowered rates of interest on bonds.

He believes in an American standard of living. And he is asking that his status be raised to the American level; not that the general level be lowered to his. He is asking that some practicable means be found to make up the tremendous annual deficit of $5,000,000,000 on the American farm, as recommended by officials of the National Industrial Conference Board at Chicago last December; he is asking for a stabilized price for farm products maintained throughout the year, unaffected by imaginary cotton never planted or ginned or by phantom wheat neither sown nor harvested. In brief, he is asking to be taken into the American protective system; asking that he be protected against Asiatic prices for his wheat, South American prices for his corn, and African prices for his cotton, while he pays American prices for all he buys. Development of waterways alone will not accomplish this. Cooperative marketing, unsupplemented, can not bring it about. A Federal board without power to control production and handle farm surpluses can not effect it. But there is a way. Mr. Hoover unerringly pointed out the solution in his speech at St. Louis just before the election last fall, when he said:

> The first and most complete necessity is that the American farmer have the American market. That can be assured to him solely through the protective tariff.

Personally, I am not so enamored of prohibitive tariff. It is an arbitrary and artificial interference with economic law. It has been made frequently the instrument of flagrant injustice. But we are confronted to-day by a condition and not a theory. The whole fabric of our industrial system is based on the principle of protection of domestic labor and domestic commerce from foreign competition; on the reservation of American markets for American products. Even if it were desirable, the system can not be changed in a day. All must concede that we face a situation in which there is not the slightest possibility of any appreciable change in the protective system for years to come. Under such circumstances it is futile to argue an academic question while agriculture waits.

In view of this situation, I am constrained to concur in the views expressed by Mr. Henry A. Wallace when he said last December:

> I don't think much of tariff as a long-time method of solving the agricultural problem. However, as long as we have a high-tariff party in power which has declared in favor of using the tariff to do justice to agriculture, we might as well follow the example of industry and get what we can. If we fight hard enough to get our fair share of the tariff plunder, it may be that the industrial interests of the United States will wake up to the true significance of the tariff.

It is evident from many indications that the business interests of the Nation are already awakening to its true significance. There are strong indications of a revulsion of sentiment and a growing realization that prohibitive tariffs on foreign goods inevitably react on foreign markets for our own goods. But be that as it may, it is certain that for the present there can be no fundamental change in tariff policies, and we must adapt ourselves to conditions as we find them. In brief, that agriculture must be taken into the protective system and given the benefit of protective tariffs along with other American business interests.

That a bare enactment of tariff schedules for farm products or a mere increase in present tariff rates, without legislative provision to make those tariffs effective would be futile, is self-evident. Tariffs on farm products or any other commodity of which we produce an exportable surplus have no more effect on farm prices than legislative enactments on the rotations of the planets.

For example, on March 6, 1924, the duty on wheat was raised from 30 to 42 cents a bushel. Immediately there was a slump on the Liverpool market, promptly reflected in our domestic market, aggregating 11⅛ cents in 21 days. No amount of political or theoretical sophistry can controvert the naked testimony of a daily market report. On October 15, 1924, to choose a date at random, during the height of the campaign, when the tariff would have been invoked, if ever, No. 1 hard northern wheat sold at Winnipeg, Canada, without a tariff, for $1.23⅞ per bushel. On the same day, at Minneapolis, just across the boundary line in the United States, with a tariff of 42 cents a bushel, it sold for $1.11½.

Had the tariff been effective the price would have been 42 cents higher in the United States than in Canada for wheat of similar grade and a quotation of $1.23⅞ at Winnipeg would have meant a quotation of $1.65⅞ at Minneapolis instead of the $1.11½ for which it actually sold. This is typical. Compare the market reports from Winnipeg and Minneapolis any day in the year and note the utter failure of the tariff to affect farm prices. It is also apparent in the foreign and domestic prices of all other tariff-protected farm products of which we produce a surplus. The Department of Agriculture in a report released January 23, 1929, announced that the decreased estimate of the Argentine corn crop had materially advanced corn prices in the United States. And testimony before the Committee on Ways and Means only a few days ago showed that the price of potatoes in the United States was directly affected by the crop yield of Prince Edward Island. The daily market reports prove conclusively that tariffs on farm products produced in excess of domestic requirements are ineffective to the point of absurdity; so useless and so senseless, in fact, as to reflect gravely on the sincerity and good faith of those who advocate them, and on their estimate of the intelligence and gullibility of those for whose pretended benefit they are proposed.

It is apparent, therefore, that the problem confronting the administration and the Congress is not a question of levying or increasing farm tariffs but a question of making such tariffs effective. The farm slogan is no longer "a tariff for all or a tariff for none," but "an effective tariff for all or a tariff for none."

In other words, tariff and surplus control are inseparable. One is useless without the other. Just what legislative means can be adopted which will include both and thereby provide for a disposition of farm surpluses which will secure maximum benefits of the tariff for agriculture, is still an open question. Whether it be secured through an equalization fee, a commission, a marketing charge, a rebate, or some other method is not particularly material. The sole requirement, the sine qua non, is that it effectuate Mr. Hoover's proposal, "That the American farmer be assured the American market through the protective tariff." That is the farm objective in the coming session of Congress. The administrative details of the plan through which that objective is to be attained are secondary.

It is significant, however, that after eight years of intensive study by economists, financiers, farm organizations, and legislators; after six years of exhaustive debate in which all avenues of approach have been thoroughly explored and charted, no plan yet has been suggested which so nearly conforms to these requirements as that embodied in the McNary-Haugen bill. It may be that some one will yet offer a plan overlooked in these years of study and investigation which will better control farm surpluses and more adequately assure effective tariffs. If so, it will be most welcome. Neither Congress nor the farm organizations are wedded to the McNary-Haugen bill. If a better bill can be formulated, if a more satisfactory plan can be devised to insure the farmer the benefits of the protective system, it will meet with the wholehearted support of all true friends of farm relief. The resolution adopted by the American Federation of the Farm Bureau at Chicago is explicit on this point. After referring to its indorsement of the McNary-Haugen bill in former Congresses, the federation said:

> We are willing to compare legislation which has received our support in the past with that proposed by any other organization. We are also willing to consider these subjects with the forthcoming national administration from time to time to find, if possible, a better way than we have heretofore supported of effectuating adequate control of agricultural surpluses, of protecting and advancing cooperative commodity marketing, and of establishing on our farms the benefits of the American protective system, all of which secure that American standard of living which agriculture and industry alike desire.

And if the farm organizations continue their indorsement of the McNary-Haugen bill until a better bill is written, there is no reason why Congress should not continue its support of the McNary-Haugen principle until a better plan is presented.

The McNary-Haugen bill is the legislative protégé of both parties. It is indubitably a Republican measure. It was first suggested by a Republican Secretary of Agriculture; it was originally drafted by farm leaders who were without exception life-long Republicans; it was perfected and introduced by HAUGEN, of Iowa, one of the elders and leaders of the Republican Party in the House; it was considered and reported favorably by a Republican Committee on Agriculture; and was passed by a Congress in which the Republican Party held an overwhelming majority in both House and Senate. The McNary-Haugen bill is essentially a Republican measure.

And by the same criterion it is a Democratic measure. It had the indorsement and support of every Democratic farm leader who appeared in Washington in behalf of agricultural relief. A majority of the Democrats in both the House and the Senate voted for it on final passage. It was officially indorsed by the Democratic Party at Houston. Here is the Democratic plank on farm relief:

> We pledge the party to an earnest endeavor to solve this problem of the distribution of the cost of dealing with crop surpluses over the marketed units of the crop whose producers are benefited by such assistance. The solution of this problem would avoid Government subsidy to which the Democratic Party has always been opposed.

There you have the McNary-Haugen bill in its entirety, lock, stock, and barrel, equalization fee and all.

And last, it is indorsed and advocated by the standard bearer of the Democratic Party. Governor Smith said at Omaha:

> As I read the McNary-Haugen bill, its fundamental purpose is to establish an effective control of the sale of exportable surplus with the cost imposed upon the commodity benefited. For that principle the Democratic platform squarely stands, and for that principle I squarely stand.

The McNary-Haugen bill is a Democratic measure, championed and supported by the representatives of the Democratic Party in the House of Representatives and in the Senate of the United States; by the representatives of the Democratic Party in quadrennial session assembled at Houston; and by the official standard bearer of the Democratic Party in the greatest political campaign ever waged in America. It is essentially a Democratic measure.

And if both parties have fostered and supported the McNary-Haugen bill and the equalization fee for the last four years why should they not support them for the next four years? If an overwhelming majority of both parties in both Houses of Congress voted for the bill and the fee last May, is there any reason why they should not vote for them this coming May? It conforms to Mr. Hoover's plan enunciated at St. Louis. It will make the farm tariff effective. It will assure the American farmer the American market through the agency of the protective tariff.

A majority of the Members of this House, after mature deliberation and detailed study extending over a period of eight years, declared by their recorded votes that they approved the McNary-Haugen bill and believed it to be the most feasible plan of farm relief which has been presented. There has been no material change in the situation since that vote was taken. The farmer is as much in need of relief to-day as he was then. The same economic laws are in force to-day which were in force last May. And the principles which we advocated in the campaign last fall are as sound now as they have been at any time heretofore. Having supported the bill in the Sixty-ninth and Seventieth Congresses, shall we now face about and oppose it? Are Members of Congress weather vanes, veering with every changing breeze that blows? Are they mere camp followers, trailing political dispensers of largess, and ready to desert any principle "that thrift may follow fawning"? Are they fair-weather friends of the farmer, loud in protestations of loyalty on the stump and on the Chautauqua platform, but ready to seek cover at the approach of the first cloud? Are they band-wagon patriots, without stability, ready to sacrifice conviction to expediency, to climb up beside the bass drum? Are they statesmen or politicians? We said the bill was right and we voted for it in the Sixty-ninth Congress. We said it was still right and we voted for it again in the Seventieth Congress. Is there any tenable reason why we should not be consistent and vote for it a third time in the Seventy-first Congress? If it was economic then, it is economic now. If it was workable then, it is workable now. If it was right then, it is right now. Having put our hand to the plow, shall we now turn back?

It has been contended by opponents of farm relief that the result of the election last November should be interpreted as antagonistic to the McNary-Haugen bill. Such statements usually emanate from those with whom the wish is father to the thought. The election last fall was in no sense of the word a referendum on the McNary-Haugen bill. It is only necessary to glance casually over the election returns to be convinced of the fallacy of this contention. To illustrate, the people of Iowa voted overwhelmingly for the Republican ticket. Who would say that they were impelled to vote for Mr. Hoover because of their opposition to the McNary-Haugen bill? On the other hand, Massachusetts was carried for the Democratic ticket. Who would contend that the people of Massachusetts voted for Governor Smith because they favored the McNary-Haugen bill? Search through the entire returns for a single indication that the result in any State was influenced in the slightest degree by the attitude of the voters on the question of farm relief. Wisconsin, Indiana, Kansas, Nebraska, North Dakota, South Dakota, Colorado, and Montana went Republican. And yet the congressional delegations from these States which had voted solidly for the McNary-Haugen bill were returned practically to a man by the same electorate which voted so enthusiastically for Mr. Hoover. Likewise, the States of Delaware, Georgia, Louisiana, and Rhode Island voted unanimously against the McNary-Haugen bill in Congress last May and almost as emphatically for the Democratic ticket in the election last November. The idea that the McNary-Haugen bill or the equalization fee had any part in the determination of the last national election is refuted by every rule of political deduction. It is true that some of us desired to make it an issue, but as well have tried to interest a small boy in the midweek prayer meeting with a 3-ringed circus putting on a free performance in town, as to interest the voters last fall in any economic issue, agriculture or otherwise. The vote for President of the United States in the last election was in no respect a vote on the McNary-Haugen bill. There has been no change of attitude on the part of the farmers or of the country at large on the question of farm relief. The need and demand for remedial legislation is as insistent to-day as it was a year ago. The Farmer's Union of America, meeting at Jamestown, N. Dak., on November 17, 1928, just 11 days after the election, with 455 accredited delegates in attendance, passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That we renew our demand for the enactment of the McNary-Haugen bill without compromise on the equalization feature.

The tenth annual meeting of the American Farm Bureau Federation, meeting at Chicago on December 10, 1928, with 40 State farm bureaus officially represented, and speaking for more than 2,000,000 organized farmers, said:

We reiterate the principles for which we have striven in the past * * * to require all portions of the crop to share in the cost of bringing the crop into the American protective system. * * * This legislation must be of a nature which does not subsidize agriculture. * * * We have seen nothing up to this time which would cause us to recede from our former position.

And practically every other farm organization in the United States, including the Corn Belt committee, unites in this indorsement with increasing emphasis.

It is futile to defer action in the hope that the problem will adjust itself. The situation instead of improving grows every year more acute. Competition of foreign agricultural products with American agricultural products is increasing. World production of foodstuffs and raw materials is expanding. The United States Department of Agriculture reports that 44 nations have increased their wheat production for 1928 5.4 per cent over that of 1927. The Canadian crop for 1928 was 45,000,000 bushels more than that produced in 1927, and the Dominion embraces vast areas of potential wheat lands yet unutilized. The introduction of power machinery in Argentina, India, Egypt, Australia, and other countries where cheap land and cheap labor are competing with the American farmer, is being pushed vigorously by American manufacturers and is tremendously increasing the pressure on the world markets which fix the price of wheat in America. In Russia especially, one of the greatest wheat-growing countries of all time, the importation of tractors and combines manufactured in the United States, has made it possible for one Russian, working for a pittance, to produce as much wheat as 500 men formerly produced with ox teams and primitive equipment. Competition is growing. The Asiatic coolie, the Russian peasant, and the Argentine peon are throwing an ever-increasing flood of foodstuffs into the markets of the world to compete with the American farmer; to hammer down the price of his products; and to pull his family down to their meager standard of living.

It is to meet this competition, increasing with each crop season, that the farmer asks the enactment of the McNary-Haugen bill. American labor refuses to compete with the pauper labor of Europe and Asia; American industry refuses to compete with foreign industry; and the farmer who is paying the increased prices required for their protection sees no reason why he is not entitled to the same protection against the same enemy. To extend this protection is the purpose and mission of the special session of Congress soon to be convened. Mr. Hoover has assured us that he regards the problem as the supreme challenge of his administration. It is more than that. It is a challenge of the constructive statesmanship of the Congress and of every Member, regardless of section or party. And it should be approached with an open mind and in a spirit of broad and earnest cooperation.

It is difficult to imagine circumstances under which the last six years of study and struggle would go for naught and the bill which twice has been passed by Congress be entirely discarded, but if Mr. Hoover brings forward a measure embodying another but equally effective plan, it should have universal support. The one desideratum is that it make the farm tariff effective. In the words of Abraham Lincoln we should—

Stand with anybody that stands right. Stand with him while he is right and part with him when he goes wrong.

MEMORIAL TO COL. WILLIAM COLVILL

Mr. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks by inserting as a part of my remarks an address delivered by President Coolidge on July 29, 1928, at Cannon Falls, Minn., in connection with the dedication of a memorial to Col. William Colvill; also the dedicatory address delivered by Lieut. Col. E. C. Clemans, and the new national anthem, America, My Country, as sung by the chorus of the One hundred and thirty-fifth Infantry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing an address delivered by President Coolidge in Minnesota some time ago, together with other matters incident to the occasion. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House of Representatives, to the rural community of Cannon Falls, one of the thriving little cities of Goodhue County, Minn., came President Coolidge and men prominent in State and national affairs, on Sunday, July 29, 1928, to help dedicate a Civil War memorial.

The Nation's Chief Executive, with his charming wife, journeyed several hundred miles to participate at the unveiling of a beautiful memorial to Col. William Colvill, commander of the First Minnesota Regiment in the Civil War.

It is because of the immortal charge during the Battle of Gettysburg—the turning point in the Civil War—that the memory of Col. William Colvill and the First Minnesota lives. Here 263 men, the strength of the regiment at the time, charged the Confederate forces and held them back in the crucial period of the conflict, and only 47 left the field when the combat was over.

The memorial, a beautiful stone, bearing a tablet recounting the history of the First Minnesota, an ornamental stone stairway, leading to the knoll on which Colonel and Mrs. Colvill are buried, and upon which stands a large bronze statue of the war hero, was unveiled by Mrs. Calvin Coolidge and dedicated by President Coolidge and Lieutenant Colonel Clemans.

The memorial to Col. William Colvill was constructed with funds donated individually by officers and men of the One hundred and thirty-fifth Infantry, lineal descendants' organization of the First, in memory of Col. William Colvill, who commanded the First Minnesota United States Volunteer Infantry at the Battle of Gettysburg, July 1 to 3, 1863. With only 262 officers and men, Colonel Colvill, by order of General Hancock, met a victorious onward march of many thousand Confederate troops under the veteran generals, Longstreet and Hill, drove them back with a bayonet charge, and held the enemy until Union forces relieved them. Forty-seven officers and men were able to leave the field; 225 were lying dead or wounded—the greatest proportionate loss of any regiment in the Civil War. The heroic charge of the already decimated regiment is credited with saving the Union Army from defeat and thus making possible a Union victory on the following day. In the final analysis, Colonel Colvill, perhaps, saved not only the Union Army and the day at Gettysburg, but turned back "the high tide of the Confederacy" and saved the Union.

Colonel Colvill was born in Chatauqua County, N. Y., in 1830. He was admitted to the bar in 1851, moved to Red Wing, Minn., where he practiced law, and in 1861, as captain in the First Minnesota, entered the Civil War. He was promoted to lieutenant colonel and colonel, and when the regiment was mustered out in 1864 was brevetted brigadier general. He entered the service again as colonel of the First Regiment of Minnesota Heavy Artillery and was mustered out at the close of the war. He served one term as Attorney General. He died June 12, 1905, and was buried at Cannon Falls, Minn.

As a soldier, statesman, and citizen Colonel Colvill gained for himself an immortal name indelibly carved upon the pages of the history of his country. As a neighbor and friend, while he lived in Cannon Falls and Red Wing, he was loved by all. His name and his deeds are history, and the people of Goodhue County are proud to have had him as its leading citizen.

ADDRESS BY HON. CALVIN COOLIDGE, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, DELIVERED AT CANNON FALLS, MINN., ON JULY 29, 1928, IN HONOR OF COL. WILLIAM COLVILL

Fellow citizens: Heroic deeds have about them an element of immortality. We stand in reverence before those who perform them and cherish their memory down through the ages because we recognize in them the manifestation of a spiritual life, the evidence of things not seen, the presence which was without beginning and is without end, a power that lifts men above the things of this earth into the realm of the divine. Except as we cherish a belief in these realities, we should have no requirement for heroic deeds and no reverence for those who do them. Because of their very nature, because a knowledge of them inspires us to higher things, it is altogether fitting that we should assemble on this Lord's Day to reconsecrate ourselves by dedicating a memorial to one of the heroes of the Battle of Gettysburg. Because we believe in the reality of right and truth and justice and recognize the necessity of supporting them with every necessary sacrifice, including life itself, we could not be engaged in any more devotional action than in reverencing the memory of those who have nobly responded to that high conception of eternal duty.

GREAT CAUSE

Heroism is not only in the man but in the occasion. While there is a certain glamour which attaches itself to the peril which the highwayman and the bandit incur in their criminal activities, it is not genuinely heroic. It will not survive analysis. It leads nowhere. Having no moral quality, it provides no inspiration. It is only a counterfeit of the reality. If it is remembered at all, it is not as a blessing but as a curse.

The memorial which we dedicate to-day is not only to the physical courage of men of high character displayed in an hour of great peril but also in behalf of a great cause. There was in their deed no element of selfishness, no hope of personal gain. It stands as an exhibition of pure patriotism, of supreme sacrifice for the integrity of the Union, and the inviolate sovereignty of the Federal Constitution. It is these qualities which bring the great concourse of our citizens to do honor to the action of Colonel Colvill and his regiment more than three score years after the event. That same honor will continue to be paid them not only so long as the Nation which they served shall endure but so long as self-sacrificing devotion to high ideals commends itself to the heart of men.

STORY OF REGIMENT

The story of Col. William Colvill and the First Minnesota Volunteer Infantry is too well known to need extended repetition. When President Lincoln called for volunteers to prevent the dissolution of the Union, this was the first regiment offered for three years' enlistment. It gave valiant service upon many a resolutely contested field, but its most conspicuous record was made at Gettysburg on the second day of that decisive battle. When the forces under the command of General Sickles advanced into action a little after noon, the First Regiment, of which only eight companies were present, numbering 262 men, took the position they vacated. The overwhelming forces of the Confederates under Longstreet and Hill repulsed and drove back the command of General Sickles and were advancing on the left flank of the Union Army, which was in grave danger of being rolled up in defeat. It was at this juncture that General Hancock ordered this depleted regiment to charge the advancing Confederates.

The gallant First Minnesota, led by Colonel Colvill, at once responded with an impetuosity that broke the first and second line of the enemy, and stopped the advance. When the action was over but 47 men of the 262 who began the charge were still in line. The remaining 215 lay dead or wounded on the field. In all the history of warfare this charge has few, if any, equals and no superiors. It was an exhibition of the most exalted heroism against an apparently insuperable antagonist. By holding the Confederate forces in check until other reserves came up, it probably saved the Union Army from defeat. What that defeat would have meant to the North no one can tell. Washington, Philadelphia, New York, and the whole heart of the North would have been lost. So far as human judgment can determine, Colonel Colvill and those eight companies of the First Minnesota are entitled to rank among the saviors of their country.

HOPE OF HUMANITY

We may well stop to consider on this Sabbath day what Power it was that stationed these men at this strategic point on this occasion, which held so much of the hope of humanity. We can only infer that it was the same power which guided the path of the Mayflower, which gave our country Franklin and Washington, which brought this Northwestern territory into the Union through the miraculous victory of George Rogers Clark at Vincennes and peopled it with a freedom-loving immigration, which raised up Lincoln and Grant, which went to the rescue of liberty in Cuba and on the fields of France. Was it not the same Power which set these men as its sentinels on that July day to guard the progress of humanity? As we behold it all we can but conclude in the words of Holy Writ that, "The judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether."

The time has come when our whole country can take a more dispassionate view of the long train of events that led up to Appomattox and the new constitutional guaranties of freedom to every inhabitant under our flag. Our national life was begun without any adequate and final declaration of the principle of freedom or demarcation of the line separating the authority of the States and the authority of the Federal Union. Some of the ablest minds of the country honestly differed in their interpretation of our institutions.

As the intensity of opinions and their application to the practical affairs of life of each side developed, they necessarily gave rise to what was described as an irrepressible conflict. That generation of the South found itself involved in a net if circumstances which very much of its best thought undoubtedly deplored, but from which it was totally unable to extricate itself. We can see now that instead of being charged with all the blame, they were in many ways entitled to sympathy. Our country was all involved in a great national tragedy from which it could extricate itself only by an appalling national sacrifice. That tragedy involved both the North and the South. The conditions which brought about the great conflict were national conditions. It was humanly impossible for either section of itself to furnish an adequate solution. If there was to be an extension of freedom under constitutional guaranties it had to be brought about by national action. Any adequate expiation required the cleansing of the heart of the whole Nation. This could not only be accomplished through an immeasurable sacrifice made in the tears of our women and the blood of our men.

GREAT TRAGEDY

When the great tragedy was passed, when the tumult of the conflict had ceased, the North found itself depleted, but the South was entirely prostrated. It was under the necessity of rebuilding its whole social and economic structure. The recovery of the North began more early, because it was not compelled to establish its methods of life and of business on new theories. It was possible to build on the solid foundation that was already laid. In the South it was necessary to go through the long and painful process of erecting an entirely new structure. The old methods of existence and of business had to be discarded and new systems established. This would have been most difficult under any circumstances. Coming at the end of four years of conflict, it was well-nigh impossible. But the task was performed slowly and imperfectly at first, but in recent years with a rapidity that seemed scarcely possible.

The agriculture which had been the dominant activity of the old South was gradually revived. Then came the development of its natural resources of coal, iron, and water power, and the growth of great manufacturing enterprises. Minerals and manufactured products are to-day almost twice the value of its agriculture. Of our overseas commerce nearly 40 per cent of the tonnage is from southern ports. Since 1900 the value of manufactured products increased from about $1,500,000,000 to about $9,500,000,000. Capital invested in cotton manufacturing increased from about $130,000,000 to about $1,000,000,000. Deposits in banks in the same period have risen from $700,000,000 to $7,000,000,000. In public improvements the progress has been very marked. In 1904 less than $13,000,000 were spent on highways. In 1925 this amount had reached $316,000,000. In 1900 only about $35,000,000 were laid out for public schools. In 1924 this amount had risen to over $350,000,000. It is perfectly apparent that in progress and prosperity the South is going forward in a way which it could never have done under the old system. It is no wonder that it is referred to now as the new South.

It has been demonstrated that what never could have been created under a condition of servitude is the almost natural result of a condition of freedom. Human nature has been so designed that men are only at their best when they are permitted to live like men. It is when they are released from bondage of the body, given control over their own actions, receive the returns from their own labor, and released from bondage of the mind, so that ignorance and superstition are replaced by education and moral influences that most progress is made toward an enlightened civilization.

Meantime our whole Nation has risen into a new life with unparalleled swiftness. Out of the sacrifices that were made in our war labor was given a new dignity throughout the whole country. Since that time its position has almost constantly improved, until to-day the value of human effort is recognized in this country by a system of wages and a standard of living never before reached in all past history. We have been taught that it is profitable not only that labor should be free but that it should be well paid. Under that practice our national income advanced from about $65,000,000,000 in 1921 to about $90,000,000,000 in 1927. These material results would not have been possible without the spiritual regeneration of our country.

NO HOSTILITY

One result of the war which retarded our national progress for many years was the bitterness, hatred, and sectional animosities that it left in its wake. For many years, both for the North and for the South, these were unfortunately stimulated and kept alive for the political advantage that the sponsors of such action hoped to secure. The time has long since passed when to hold or express such hostile sentiments should ever be permitted to work to the advantage of anyone. Those who resort to them should find that their standing in the public confidence is thereby seriously impaired. While isolated outbreaks may continue to occur in unresponsible quarters, I am firmly convinced that the responsible elements both in the North and the South each look with pride and satisfaction upon the brilliant contribution which the other is making to the national welfare and are just as eager to help the other as they are to help themselves. A notable example of this occurred in the last session of the Congress when the flood-relief measure for the lower Mississippi Valley, which will probably equal in cost the Panama Canal and a very large amount of which will be paid for by Northern States, passed by practically a unanimous vote. The day of sectionalism is passed. We are a united Nation.

It is in accordance with these conceptions that we have come to-day to dedicate this memorial and to rededicate ourselves to the support and preservation of those principles which have been demonstrated through long experience to be sound. We have come to increase our admiration for all that is heroic in life, to express our reverence for those who have made sacrifices for the well-being of their fellow men, to renew our fealty to the Constitution of the United States, to rejoice in the universal freedom which it guarantees, and in the perfect Union which it has created, and, finally, for all these blessings in gratitude and humility to acknowledge our dependence upon the Giver of every true and perfect gift.

AMERICA, MY COUNTRY

(The new national anthem)

By Jens K. Grondahl, Red Wing, Minn.

America, my country, I come at thy call,
I plight thee my troth and I give thee my all;
In peace or in war I am wed to thy weal,
I'll carry thy flag thru the fire and the steel.
Unsullied it floats o'er our peace-loving race,
On sea nor on land shall it suffer disgrace;
In rev'rence I kneel at sweet liberty's shrine,
America, my country, command, I am thine.

America, my country, brave souls gave thee birth,
They yearned for a haven of freedom on earth.
When proudly thy flag to the winds was unfurled,
There came to thy shores the opprest of the world.
Thy milk and thy honey flow freely for all,
Who takes of thy bounty shall come at thy call;
Who quaffs of thy nectar of freedom shall say:
"America, my country, command, I obey."

America, my country, now come is thy hour,
The Lord God of hosts counts thy courage and pow'r;
Humanity pleads for the strength of thy hand
That peace and good will rule on sea and on land.
Thou guardian of freedom, thou keeper of right,
When liberty bleeds we may trust in thy might;
No more shall the sword and the saber enthrall,
America, my country, I come at thy call.

CHORUS

America, my country, I answer thy call,
That freedom may live and that tyrants may fall;
I owe thee my all and my all will I give,
I do and I die that America may live.

DEDICATORY ADDRESS—LIEUT. COL. E. C. CLEMANS

The summer camps of the Minnesota National Guard regiments are named after members of the regiment, who, though dead, yet speak of service and heroism. The camp of this regiment, the One hundred and thirty-fifth Infantry, at Lake City last year was named in loving memory of William Colvill, the colonel of the First Minnesota in the Battle of Gettysburg, the decisive battle of the Civil War. The One hundred and thirty-fifth Infantry has been recognized by the War Department as the lineal successor of the First Minnesota, of Civil War fame, "first," not only in name but the first regiment accepted by President Lincoln for service in the War of the Rebellion. This memorial tablet gives the royal succession: First Minnesota, Civil War; Thirteenth Minnesota, Spanish American War; First Minnesota, Mexican border service; One hundred and thirty-fifth Infantry, World War; and on the battle streamers that adorn the regimental flag you can read the names of battles from 1861 to 1918. Our heroic dead lie on every battle field from Bull Run to the forest of the Argonne in France.

It was suggested at the regimental camp last year that the coming year the regiment, on the encampment Sunday, go in a body to Cannon Falls, and, at the grave of Colonel Colvill, the chaplain of the regiment conduct divine services, and the colonel of the regiment place a wreath upon the grave of the hero of Gettysburg. Col. O. I. Ronningen, the commanding officer of the regiment, immediately appointed a commission, composed of Lieut. Col. E. C. Clemans, Lieut. Col. W. T. Mollison, Maj. R. E. Gillesby, and First Lieutenant Soper to provide for a regimental memorial to be placed on the grave in Cannon Falls. The commission met and organized, erected this memorial with its surrounding steps, walks, and seats of Bedford stone, this bronze tablet giving the glorious, historical succession of one of the most famous regiments in the service of our country. And we have met to-day, honored by the presence of the President of the United States and his wife, these venerable survivors of the First Minnesota, these members of the Grand Army of the Republic, these statesmen, soldiers, and citizens of Minnesota met in patriotic and reverential assemblage to dedicate this memorial.

We dedicate this memorial to the flag of the First Minnesota of the Civil War, presented in April, 1861, to the regiment by the ladies of St. Paul, carried in victorious battle, war worn, bullet riddled, blood stained, its staff broken in two places by the shrapnel of the enemy, spliced with a section of a Confederate flagstaff, emblematical of a reunited North and South; the flag returned with the regiment to St. Paul, after three years gallant service, now resting in the capitol building of our State with not one star lost, not one stripe sullied—"it never touched the ground."

We dedicate this memorial to the members of the First Minnesota, "the brave men living and dead," who never failed to respond to every call of duty; who carried their flag in 23 battles; who, led by Colonel Colvill, shoulder to shoulder, marched to what seemed certain death; who determined to die "to the last man," if need be, to save the day; who charged bayonets and drove back a division of Confederates many times their number; who saved the battle the second day of the Gettysburg fight, in the last analysis saving the United States; who, out of 262 officers and men who went into the fight left 225 dead, wounded, or dying on the field. The First Minnesota, first in name, first in response to President Lincoln's call, first in its dreadful percentage of death at Gettysburg, first in the hearts of the officers and men of the One hundred and thirty-fifth Infantry, first in the hearts of the citizens of Minnesota, and, we trust in time to be, first with other brave regiments in the hearts of the American people.

We dedicate this memorial to the memory of Col. William Colvill, citizen soldier, loyal American, comrade as well as commanding officer, "wounded as wounded" with his men, modest and unassuming, calm and well poised. The brave officer, who, when asked by General Hancock on that bloody second day at Gettysburg whether he could hold back the victorious Confederates until the imperiled left flank of the Union Army could be reinforced replied, "General, to the last man!" To William Colvill, captain, major, colonel, brevet brigadier general, whose massive statue looks down upon us, cast in a metal which but feebly typifies his unflinching courage and bravery, we dedicate this memorial with the fond hope that his life of patriotic service and devotion may inspire us to greater love and service for the flag, which he so greatly loved and for the country he helped so heroically to save.

My comrades of the One hundred and thirty-fifth Infantry, in honoring William Colvill we have honored ourselves. With no help from the outside, you, each one of you, have contributed to make this memorial possible. You have done this with the firm intention to make the people of Minnesota and of the Nation remember the man whose heroic service and sacrifice have been forgotten. Your desire is to make the citizens of this land of ours know what William Colvill did at Gettysburg. And, my comrades, the dedication of this memorial will place his name among the immortal heroes of America. From now on no historian can write the history of America and forget William Colvill. May the memory of this great soldier and his comrades inspire us to greater service and devotion and may we, in peace or war, as citizens of "no mean country" do all we can to preserve our great Republic, born amid weeping prayer, baptized in blood, and consecrated to the sacred cause of liberty and justice for all.

NAMING OF THE CRUISER "LOUISVILLE"

Mr. THATCHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD touching the announcement of the Secretary of the Navy that the scout cruiser now under construction at the Puget Sound Navy Yard will be christened the Louisville in honor of the city of Louisville, in the State of Kentucky.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. THATCHER. Mr. Speaker, announcement has been made by the distinguished Secretary of the Navy, Hon. Curtis D. Wilbur, that the scout cruiser now under construction at the Puget Sound Navy Yard will be christened and will bear the name Louisville, in honor of Kentucky's metropolis.

Since I represent the Louisville district in Congress, I am very grateful and happy over this action. The people of my district, and of the entire Kentucky region, are likewise very grateful and happy. A just and signal honor has been paid them and the city of Louisville.

It is most fitting that this gallant cruiser should be thus named. The city which has been recognized and complimented by this action is most deserving. Something of the history touching this matter may be of interest.

In April, 1927, at Louisville, information came to me from the Washington representative of the Louisville Times, Mr. Lorenzo Martin, that the policy which the Navy Department had in mind touching the naming of the eight new cruisers whose construction had been authorized, might afford the opportunity to secure the naming of one of these cruisers for the city of Louisville. I immediately wired the Secretary of the Navy, urging the claims of Louisville in this connection, and arranged for the sending of similar wires by the mayor and board of trade of the city. A few days afterwards, in Washington, I called on the Secretary and made further representations about the matter. Ever since then it has been my pleasure to continue these efforts. Also during the past few months an intensive campaign has been waged in the like behalf. It was deemed vitally essential that the people of the Louisville community should convince the officials of the Navy Department of their earnest desire that one of these cruisers be named for their city, and that they would appreciate this great compliment, if accorded. In Louisville the mayor and other public officials, the schools and school children, the civic and patriotic clubs and organizations, aided by effective newspaper publicity, in which the Louisville Herald-Post played a very active part, joined in this campaign; while in Washington Senator SACKETT, whose home is in Louisville, and I did everything within our power to cooperate and assist.

Thus the sentiment of the people of Louisville and of the Louisville community was effectively registered in the Navy Department, and important reasons and arguments in behalf of Louisville's claims were emphasized.

Some of these reasons are set forth in a letter I had the honor to address Secretary Wilbur on the subject in November last. I quote from that letter as follows:

> Confirming the conversation I have just had with you, I earnestly hope that you may see your way clear to name for my home city of Louisville the cruiser which must shortly be christened.
>
> Louisville has many strong arguments in favor of this proposal. It was founded by the famous conqueror of the Northwest, Gen. George Roger Clark, in 1778; two years later it was incorporated by an act of the Virginia Legislature and formally called Louisville, in honor of Louis XVI of France, whose soldiers were then aiding the American cause in the Revolutionary War.
>
> The city stands at the great falls in the Ohio River, and is the greatest manufacturing center south of the Potomac and Ohio Rivers. It is a splendid city, rapidly growing, and now has a population of more than 350,000.
>
> Louisville was the base of operations of General Clark in his famous expedition to the Northwest during the Revolutionary War, by means of which expedition the great States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin were wrested from British control and permanently brought under the American flag.
> The year 1928 marks the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the city of Louisville, and the christening of this cruiser in honor of the Kentucky metropolis would, when added to the many other reasons, constitute a very happy and appropriate sesquicentennial recognition of the city's settlement and the work of its founder, mainly achieved in 1778, 150 years ago.

Among other considerations urged were the following:

Louisville is one of the most important inland cities of the Nation, and one of the most important of the entire Ohio River Valley region. Not only is it rich in historic and scenic interest, but it is also rich in every other feature of appeal. It is a city of homes, it holds a patriotic and splendid citizenry, and it is soundly progressive. Its financial and business institutions are solidly grounded. It leads the world in a number of important industries. Its hospitality is of the most thoroughgoing Kentucky brand, and is world famed.

It was a very happy idea, that of naming six of these scout cruisers after some of the more important of our interior cities. The other two have been named for two of our coast cities. By this action millions of our interior populations are brought into closer contact with the American Navy, and come to have a better understanding of its character and significance. Recently—that is to say, on February 23, 1929—I had the pleasure of accompanying Secretary Wilbur and other distinguished members of our Naval Establishment from Washington to Camden, N. J., to witness there the launching of one of these eight cruisers now under construction. This is the Salt Lake City, a sister ship of the vessel to be christened the Louisville. The launching was splendidly inspiring, and the fine patriotic address delivered by Secretary Wilbur on that occasion appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 25, 1929, in my extension of remarks upon the occasion of this launching. As indicated by the Secretary in that address, the Salt Lake City is the first of the eight scout cruisers now being constructed. That which is building at the Puget Sound Navy Yard, and which will bear the name Louisville, is the last of the eight. All of these vessels in tonnage, design, and armament will be practically identical in character. Hence, the Louisville will be of 10,000 tons displacement, with a length of 585½ feet, and a beam, or maximum width, of 65 feet. It will have an estimated speed of 32½ knots per hour. Also, it will carry nine 8-inch guns, and will have engines capable of developing more than 100,000 horsepower. This vessel is known as cruiser No. 28. It is expected that its hull will be completed about March, 1930, and its launching and formal christening will thereupon take place. This will be followed by the installation of engines, machinery, and armament, and it should be ready for service about March or April, 1931.

Mr. Speaker and colleagues, I desire now to extend to each and every one of you the heartiest possible invitation to attend the launching and christening of this gallant ship.

I quote from Secretary Wilbur's Camden address the following portions which bear on the subject of the construction of these cruisers:

> The launching of the Salt Lake City is significant, as it is the first post-treaty cruiser to be launched by the United States. Its tonnage and its armament are limited by a treaty with the great naval powers. If we were to build the type of cruiser most needed by the United States its tonnage would be 40,000 instead of 10,000 tons, and its guns would discharge 2,100-pound projectiles instead of 250 pounds, such as the Saratoga, which was building in this yard at the time of the limitation of naval armament, one of whose guns was vastly more powerful than all of the guns of the Salt Lake City combined. The war and the Washington treaty left us with an unbalanced fleet. This was because of the exigencies due to the submarine war. We abandoned cruiser construction and devoted all our shipbuilding activities to the construction of a vast merchant marine, which we expected to be sunk by submarines, and a great number of destroyers and submarines to protect our transports and the allied merchant marine. We still have these destroyers and submarines, but with the lapse of time they are rapidly approaching obsolescence.
> The treaty of Washington required us to scrap all our partly completed battle cruisers, as well as our uncompleted battleships, except the West Virginia and the Colorado, now with the fleet. We did complete ten 6-inch gun cruisers, and this represents our entire cruiser strength of vessels under 20 years of age.
> Notwithstanding our shortage in cruisers we have proceeded hesitantly, and even reluctantly, to build new cruisers, not because they are not urgently needed, but because we hoped that either by our example or by further limitation the cost of naval armament to the naval powers might be further reduced.
> Other powers to the treaty—Great Britain, Japan, France—however, proceeded to round out their fleets by the construction of the much needed cruisers. We are about to launch our first 8-inch gun cruiser. Great Britain has launched 16 (counting four 7½-inch), Japan 8, France 2, completed. We should regard this construction by these powers as evidence of the greatest possible weight as to the value of and the need of cruisers in national defense. Those who are unwilling to accept the evidence and the judgment of our own officials charged under the Constitution with our national defense, those who discount the official declarations of the President and of his Navy Department, should be persuaded by this tangible evidence, the best possible proof, by other naval powers, as to such need. Nor are we driven to the necessity of inference from actual cruiser construction, however plain and manifest that inference, but we have the most formal and solemn statement of British needs, made in friendly conference at Geneva, that she needs, must have, and is constructing with all reasonable diligence 600,000 tons of cruisers.

The unanimous testimony of all naval authorities thus agrees to the positive need of cruisers.

In this general connection it is interesting to note the fact that while at present no naval vessel of the United States bears the name Louisville, during the World War there was a cruiser which carried this name; and during that critical period that ship made many interesting and hazardous trips between American and European ports and in a large way operated in the submarine and mine-infested waters of the European zones. It was retired from naval service shortly after the close of the World War. Before that time it had also known distinguished naval service in the Spanish-American War, bearing the name City of St. Louis. Later, under the same name, it became a trans-Atlantic liner, and thus operated until the United States entered the world conflict when, as already indicated, it became a craft of the United States Navy, bearing the name Louisville.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, the present Congress has enacted the necessary legislation authorizing the construction of 15 additional scout cruisers of the same character as the 8 already mentioned; and necessary appropriations for the beginning of this additional program of construction have been made during this session. Thus, within a few years our Navy will be increased by the total of 23 new scout cruisers.

Of the 15 additional cruisers just authorized, the first 5 will be of the same tonnage, horsepower, and dimensions as the 8 cruisers now under construction.

The armament of these 5 cruisers will each include nine 8-inch guns, just as will be the case with 6 of the 8 cruisers now building; that is to say, No. 26, No. 27, No. 28, No. 29, No. 30, and No. 31. Of the indicated 8 cruisers, the Pensacola and Salt Lake City, No. 24 and No. 25, respectively, though identical with the 6 remaining cruisers of the 8 in all other respects, will each carry ten 8-inch guns, instead of 9, as will be the case with the other 6 of this group of 8. The remaining 10 cruisers of the 15 just authorized it is expected will be of the same tonnage, general dimensions, horsepower, and armament as the first 5 of the group of 15; subject, however, to such modifications of machinery and equipment as improved processes and discoveries may warrant.

The eight cruisers now under construction will bear the names: Pensacola, in honor of Pensacola, Fla.; Salt Lake City, in honor of Salt Lake City, Utah; Northampton, in honor of Northampton, Mass.; Chester, in honor of Chester, Pa.; Chicago, in honor of Chicago, Ill.; Houston, in honor of Houston, Tex.; Augusta, in honor of Augusta, Ga.; and Louisville, in honor of Louisville, Ky.

The citizens of Louisville and of the Louisville region not only account themselves signally honored because this new cruiser will bear the name Louisville, but they deem themselves and their city as being also most highly honored by reason of the fact that so many other splendid cities of the country were friendly, but unsuccessful, rivals and contenders. Great credit is due to those who have cooperated in the effort to secure this favorable action by the Navy Department, and who have aided in the popular campaign to bring forth, and to register with naval officials, the interest of the people of the Louisville community in behalf of the claims of the city. This campaign was excellently conducted, and now that the movement to secure the naming of one of the eight cruisers in honor of the city of Louisville has been crowned with success, the Louisville community, in a collective way, is most grateful to all of those individuals, officials, agencies, and organizations that have cooperated to bring about this result.

Also, the thanks of the Louisville community are especially due to the distinguished Secretary of the Navy, who is shortly to retire from office after the performance of a period of distinguished, able, and patriotic service. Therefore, in behalf of the city of Louisville and in behalf of the men, women, and children of Louisville and the Louisville region, I take advantage of this opportunity to indicate, in this public manner, to Secretary Wilbur the assurances of their deepest appreciation and gratitude because of his action in conferring upon their city and upon them this great honor. Also I join them in giving expression to the belief that no worthier name for this gallant ship of the line could have been found than that which has been given it; and the prophecy is now indulged that, manned by American sailors, carrying the flag of our country, and bearing the name Louisville, this magnificent cruiser in the years to come after it shall be completed and committed unto the sea, will fully sustain the noblest traditions of the American Navy, and will bring to the city for which it is named the greatest possible measure of honor and renown.

THE PROBLEM OF PERMANENCY

Mr. WINTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on the subject of our American institutions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to extend his own remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINTER. Mr. Speaker, my theme is large. In fact, it is so great that I feel my utter inadequacy to present it. I can hope to give you but a fleeting glimpse of its vast circle. It is drawn from the depths of antiquity, it stretches into the unknown future, and yet it is of vital present interest to every American. It is the problem of the permanency of our national life and civilization.

From the far reaches of history I desire to draw, if possible, a few truths that, coupled with present science and philosophy, may well concern us in contemplating our present and future national life, and which are applicable to our individual lives.

No reader of history has failed to be profoundly impressed with the number of great nations, peoples, and civilizations which have appeared and disappeared—risen to supreme power and fallen into oblivion. Babylon, Assyria, Egypt, Greece, Rome, these and many more, forming a procession of colossals, have moved majestically from out the darkness of ignorance and barbarism into the light of civilization, power, preeminence, and then have passed tragically off the theater of the world's activities. To-day, we excavate their cities from the shifting sands of the deserts, or new cities have reared their growth over the old, or the old still exists, but in a living death, devoid of spirit or power or hope.

We ask, Why? Is there no such thing as permanency? Does the law of nature which demands motion, require inevitable endings, constant beginnings? Can there be no great world growth of humanity in the large continuing sense, except through new and successive peoples and waves or epochs? Must there always be displacement and replacement? In human history this law has been invariable. Every civilization in the past, with the exception of those nations or cities whose extinction may have been due to great climatic or seismic changes, has seen its period of overbalance, ultrarefinement, wealth and commercial greed, luxury, weakness, and decay; then, subjugation or supersession by a fresh race, physically strong, with a will to conquer.

These are underlying laws and principles that we must consider if we go to the bottom of the question. I may now say some startling things, but I ask that you suspend judgment until the entire theme is presented. In the human physical organization there are in the blood two kinds of corpuscles, the red and the white; the red, representing the iron, the strength-giving element; the white, the refining element. The savage represents the abnormal preponderance of the red; the highly cultured, the preponderance of the white; the one is undercivilized, the other overrefined.

ANTERIOR AND POSTERIOR BRAIN

In the first you will find excessive posterior development of the head or brain; in the second you will find an excessive frontal development. The frontal is the guiding influence, presiding over the mental attributes; the posterior is the motive power, presiding over the physical. Note that development runs from the posterior head to the frontal; that means the ascendancy of the intellectual in the individual, in peoples the advancement of civilization; in both, culture, education, gentleness, wealth. So far, so good. Then we come to the excess of these things—excess at the cost of their complements—their completements, the balance of qualities.

Carried to excess, meaning great disproportion, we find that culture results in insincerity and insincerity in falseness; education in the impractical, the impractical in the visionary; gentleness in effeminacy, and effeminacy in weakness; wealth is followed by idleness, and idleness by corruption. The end of all these is failure and death.

In the posterior brain development we find in the first alignment strength, courage, humanness (meaning social instinct, impulsiveness, passion, emotion), freedom—all beneficial and necessary, but which, carried to excess to the exclusion of their balancing qualities, their complements, develop as follows: Strength to brutality, to violence; courage to recklessness, to bravado; humanness to dissipation, to degradation; freedom to lawlessness, to savagery. And the end of all these is failure and death.

INDIVIDUAL EXAMPLES OF EXTREMES

Thus it is apparent that extremes kill. Let us take two individual examples. Here is a man who is an example of the utmost extremes of culture, gentleness, education, and wealth. His stock has run its course through seven or eight generations of wealth and idleness and is dying of decay. Vice finds him an easy prey; he has no powers of resistance, no constitution to withstand, no will; his moral, mental, and physical fibers are loosed. There is little hope for him; his inevitable end, in the natural course, is decadence and—death. It is not entirely his fault. The generations that have gone before him are in a great measure responsible; though to every man is given conscience, the divine spark, and if he wills he may save himself against all odds. But the process has gone far, accelerated by his own deliberate acts. He will perish.

On the other hand, here is a man whose blood is red. Heredity gave him that. Contact with nature has accentuated it. He comes from a fresh, virile, strong stock. His frontal development has been deficient; his posterior brain qualities are abnormally intense. He has the good qualities that belong to this type—strength, courage, humanness, love of freedom—but these have gone to their natural excess in him for lack of influence of the white corpuscle, the anterior brain qualities; and he has therefore been violent, brutal, lawless, savage. He is therefore subject to the penalty of these extremes, which is destruction. His career, carried out to its unhindered, logical conclusion, would end in a violent death.

But he is not necessarily doomed, as is the case with our other example, his antithesis, for the reason that in him there is the raw force that survives; and capacity for development, the beginnings of the frontal qualities, white corpuscles, which, though they have been undeveloped, nevertheless are there, and may at any time begin to assert themselves. If education, refinement, culture, moral principles, ambition for higher and finer things be developed in him, if those qualities are not substituted for but added to his superabundant physical power, his wonderful vitality, his fighting spirit, his love of freedom, his daring optimism, then, indeed, will there be a man to whom all things are possible. And if he then retains, as his education and refinement continue, the qualities of strength and courage, humanness, and independence, he may rise in stable equilibrium to incalculable heights.

SAME LAW AS TO NATIONS

I have spoken of individuals. It is through the individuals multiplied that these things work out in the larger organizations. All that I have said is therefore applicable to races, peoples, governments, civilizations. The nations of the past lost their vitality! Hence the tragic procession of the great peoples of antiquity; hence Egyptian civilization went down; effeminate Greek was conquered by the hardy Roman, and, in turn, the corrupt Roman by the fresh hordes of the Goths and Huns and Vandals under Attila the Scourge. I include in this list all nations which have sunk far from former grandeur. Spain was once mistress of the world. China endures because it has not lived. Such nations exist but do not live. But China, Japan, Russia, are from barbarian stocks which are yet to live, and this brings us directly to the question.

THE AMERICAN REPUBLIC

What of the American people? What of the destiny of this Republic? Shall it be thus with us? Will history repeat itself? Will progress demand in time our displacement? Will we be subject to that invariable process, or will we be an exception to the hitherto insatiable law of racial and national rise, deterioration, and death? Shall we perish at the hands of a raw race which will destroy or overrun or absorb, and itself begin a new era of development to a higher civilization? Or will this process of the ages terminate with and for us?

THE EAST

Tendencies that lead to deterioration can be observed in this country to-day. The East, especially as its life is found in our great cities, represents the white corpuscle, the frontal development. There we find education, culture, refinement, industry, high civilization, wealth; there, too, we find the settled, centralizing, conservative, consolidating influences. Like the sun, the East draws everything to itself—it has the habit of increase, increment. Customs, manners, habits, views there converge, contract, set, crystallize. We can already note there exclusion, seclusion, attenuation, overbreeding, interbreeding, the gradual diminution of physical power and motive force. Excessive and long-continued wealth, handed down from generation to generation in one family or relationship, is beginning to show its effects. The process of dissipation and idleness shows on the surface in moral disintegration, broken domestic relations, subnormal birth rate, dishonest business practices, domination of wealth, vice. Unhindered, carried to its natural end, all these mean ultimate destruction.

THE WEST

The West of this country has represented and now largely represents the red corpuscle, the posterior brain development and its particular attributes. The accompanying tendencies have in the past rather been in the ascendency, and whereas we have seen and admired the characteristics of strength, courage, humanness, freedom, we know they have many times run to excess and become, in their intermediate form, brutality, recklessness, dissipation, lawlessness, and in their last stages, violence, bravado, degradation, savagery. All of which, unhindered by the influence of the white corpuscle, the anterior balance, spell ultimate destruction.

In the natural course of events, the East would die of disease. which is general and complete—annihilative decadence. The West, if left to its tendencies alone, would be swept by violence, which is individual—destructive savagery. The West would not die; its more forceful element would endure and supersede.

POSTERIOR HEAD QUALITIES SURVIVE

Then, of the two excesses or extremes, the posterior brain force, the red corpuscle, the element of the stronger stock, will survive. The simple reason is that there is no hope where there is decay; dissolution has set in. It is the end—the stock has lived its life. The violence of the other extreme is significant of force, power, life, growth. It is the beginning—the stock has yet to run its course.

REASONS FOR PERPETUITY OF AMERICA

Now, it is indeed a bold man who would deliberately say that with our own people and Nation the inexorable processes of the ages will be turned aside. But I believe that there are reasons which justify us in entertaining the hope that our Nation, our civilization, Americanism, will endure indefinitely.

I preface my reasons with the obvious proposition, that it being the extremes that kill, the solution of the problem of permanency of continuous efficient life, is the normal, the golden mean.

ILLUSTRATIONS

This is true in everything. All work deadens; all idleness atrophies. Neither the Arctic Zone nor the Torrid Zone produces as does the Temperate Zone. Neither mountain peaks nor the swampy low lands, but the great intermediate plains and valleys feed the world. All study without experiment, or all experiment without study, all theory or all practice do not produce the desired results. An architect's dream is of no value unless reduced to blue print and produced in wood or stone or steel; on the other hand, we do not build a house without plans. Ultraconservatism kills by inaction, ultraradicalism by overaction; progress lies between. Nonresistance and nonpreparedness insure dishonor and defeat; ultramilitarism seeks aggression and will not be borne by a free people; honor and safety lie between. Science tells us that we are all either abnormal or subnormal in some respect in some degree. The normal is the perfect type. The true course then is that of balance, harmony, a proper combination.

PROPER COMBINATION

The first series of qualities of both the frontal and posterior head development are all good and all necessary to civilization and progress. The problem is not, then, how to retard or shackle either, but how, along with the growth of each, to keep them properly proportioned. So that as long as each of these tendencies has its proper place and influence in our country's people, they will each prevent the other from going to the extreme characteristic of each; thus the balance may be maintained permanently; and, though each develop indefinitely, the second and third harmful stages may be avoided. Note, if you mingle properly or combine reasonably education and freedom, you need not fear that they will ever become the impractical and visionary on the one hand or lawlessness or savagery on the other. Likewise, combine in the same race culture and courage; then insincerity and falseness, recklessness and bravado are eliminated. Again, join gentleness and humanness and you eradicate effeminacy and weakness, dissipation and degradation. Given a people who have both wealth and strength, and you will have no idleness and corruption, brutality and violence. The rule is that these qualities act as a check upon each other and prevent the extremes.

So the question is, Shall we be able in this country to maintain the right development of the frontal and posterior brain, the guiding and the propelling forces, the conservative and the radical, the white corpuscle and the red, avoid the extremes, maintain the mean, and thus endure? There are reasons to encourage a belief that we will.

FRESH STOCK

We are as a people a fresh, practically a new, stock. The hardy, the vigorous, the daring, the bold, the courageous, the strong, joined together in our Revolution to establish the new nation. They were explorers, builders, fighters, men of red blood, freedom lovers; they excelled in the hardier virtues; their posterior brain development, presiding over the physical, was strong, dominant. So, as a fresh stock, we have our national life yet to live.

VITAL FORCES MAINTAINED BY OCCUPATION OF NEW TERRITORY

We find an added argument for our perpetuity in that all through our national life, so far, the greater proportion of our people have been engaged in toil in the soil, in the subduing of the wilderness. They are yet exploring, prospecting, discovering, fighting, settling, conquering. This not only requires the motive power of the dominant physical and its attendant qualities of daring, enterprise, initiative, bravery, skill, self-dependence, but it also maintains and develops these qualities and renews in the blood of our people from the East to the West, as they settle each area, the iron of health, endurance, and longevity. Thus the blood will be kept red and strong.

INFUSION OF NEW BLOOD

Though our main racial current is the dominant Anglo-Saxon, and we will have to that extent the benefits which inhere in a distinctive blood strain, we are not a single race or nationality. Men of all nations, lands, and peoples fought in our ranks, battled nature, and laid the foundation for a new country. We are a mixture of nationalities, an admixture of blood. Not only did we have this mingling of nationalities originally, thus giving us a broad foundation and obviating, or, at least, indefinitely removing, the danger of the attenuation and weakening to which a distinct and separate strain is subject, but by the vastness and fertility of our country and the desirableness of our citizenship, this infusion of the fresh blood from the common, hardy, healthy stock of all nations, eliminating the diseased and criminal, is continuing and will continue for many years. So that, tower as high as the tree of national life may, it will be supported by adequate root and soil, for there will be this constant refreshment and reinvigoration from the bottom.

PHYSICAL GEOGRAPHY

Once more, the physical geography of our country will have its effect in maintaining in our people a proper balance. That climate and soil and altitude have a decided influence upon the character of mankind is a well-settled truth. By the vastness of our country we are afforded a variety of topography that is highly beneficial.

Generally speaking, the East is the ocean, seaboard, seafaring commercial portion of this country, and its people naturally develop, through social and business intercourse, industry, and invention; and, through the intercourse of peoples and trades, wealth, and culture. In the central part, we have the Great Plains section where agriculture is predominant, where there is contact with the soil. Its peoples are developed most in healthful labor and strength. In the West, we have the mountainous regions. Mountain dwellers have always, and history affords abundant proof, been devotees of freedom, patriotic, unconquerable. "Montani semper liberi—Mountaineers are always free men." Because of them, the spirit of liberty will never die with us.

With this variety of configuration and employment, the three qualities of culture, strength, and liberty will be maintained; and as long as they exist, the Nation can not die. These physical features of our country are unchangeable, hence their influence will be perpetual.

CHARACTERISTICS IMPARTED TO EACH SECTION

Not only will these respective saving qualities continue to generate and emanate and be wrought into the characters of the respective peoples of those sections, but the sections and peoples thereof being contiguous and being interlaced, despite our great area, by a thousand ties—by rail, mail, family, travel, contact, trade, interdependence—the preserving qualities of each are disseminated and absorbed throughout the whole. The leaven of each section will spread through and elevate the mass.

THE TRUE TYPE

Most marked example of this fact to-day is our central, plains people, extending from the Rockies to the Alleghenies. From each side, they absorb the best—culture from the East, freedom from the West, which, combined with their own quality of strength, makes them the most perfectly and harmoniously developed of our people. They represent the golden mean. To-day, they are the heart, the core, of this Republic. To-day, they constitute the highest average of intelligence, character, and efficiency, the best combination of all qualities, to be found not only in the people of this Nation but they are the highest product of mankind in mass the world has produced.

BALANCED GOVERNMENT

We have a form of government that coincides and harmonizes with this theory of proper balance. Our Constitution itself is a solution of this very same problem in governmental affairs. After chiefs came monarchs, despots, royal lines, and the so-called divine right of kings. Then the people awoke to the fact that government was too much centralized in these heads and that their former individualism has left them, their liberties were gone. Denied liberty, they in time revolted against all authority and produced anarchy; and history ever since has been made up of the struggles between governing powers for more power and the people for more freedom. Out of all this it was seen that there must be both governing power, meaning law and central authority, and individual liberty.

When this Nation was established it came nearer solving the problem of the proper balance of these factors than had any nation on earth. In fact, it solved it, although readjustments will go on for many years to come. We are now in a period of regulating too unrestricted liberty, to which we swung in our revolution in our fierce reaction against a tyrannical monarchy. Our Government is so formed that there is authority—the centralizing, centripetal power, corresponding to the sun in the solar system, the white corpuscle in the human system; and there is liberty—the expanding, centrifugal power, corresponding to the force of the earth's tangent-seeking momentum in the planetary system, the red corpuscle in the human system. Thus, like the earth, the Government is kept in its proper orbit equally balanced between centralization and individualism. The result is orderly liberty, which should endure.

PATRIOTIC SOLIDARITY

Another point of view. The patriotic solidarity of our people, considering our mass, notwithstanding the influx of heterogeneous millions, is the most wonderful of all time. The homogeneous patriotism of our people is not a subject but an appreciating, participating citizen patriotism. It is not the forced support of a system or a name, it is not an ignorant, blind, mechanical attachment, but a broad, free, intelligent, voluntary, glorious patriotism. This is due largely to our form of government, each individual being a unit in the sum of the whole.

EXCEPTION TO ALL NATIONS

We stand to-day an exception to all nations of earth, past and present, in that, while every nation may have some of the qualities that make for continuity and some nations have many of the characteristics and reasons for longevity, no nation, save America, has all of these factors that go to insure perpetuity.

THE WORLD PREPARED FOR PERMANENT PROGRESS

Why should the present civilization, as founded and as it is progressing, ever be displaced and replaced? There is no answer which appeals to reason. I hold the abiding conviction that the world is prepared for the development of a permanent, constantly progressing civilization. Why is not this, our Nation, our people, the fitting foundation for the perfect superstructure; the prepared root and stock for the perfect growth, foliage, flower, and fruit? For thousands of years mankind has been struggling upward for freedom, for justice, for liberty, for knowledge, for brotherhood. Through our race, upon our soil, under our Government may the goal of the ages be attained, and may we uplift and draw all mankind with us.

OUR DUTY

But a nation so situated and provided is like a man with talents. Talents alone do not prevail. A nation may preserve itself in efficiency, or it may fail despite all advantages. With all that has been given us it would be the calamity of all the world calamities—a crime against humanity—were Americans to fail of their high destiny.

We must remember as a people and as individuals that faith in our destiny is not enough. "Faith without works is dead." We must remember that the problem of permanency is solved by harmonious development, by equilibrium.

We are not as a people overrefined—far from it; we can not overemphasize education; education must go on and on; it is absolutely essential to our great future. We can and do underemphasize vitality. Vitality is necessary for existence, for life; and life is the sine qua non—the without which not. We must remember that highly-tempered steel crystalizes, brittles, and snaps under impact and strain, unless the strength, the molecular cohesion, the inherent tenacity of the original iron is retained.

We must bear in mind that a nation steeped in commercialism, the pursuit of material wealth, if it be to the exclusion of high ideals—in action, of strength exercised, of right defended—is treading the way of one extreme which kills, courting the loss of the spirit that battles for and preserves existence. We do not expect to be attacked. Nobody wants war. But war is a possibility. We must be able, ready, and willing to defend our life or join in the procession of the living dead.

The Greeks fell not because they became highly intellectual, beauty lovers, artists, but because they lost their stamina, their motive power, the will to live.

The Romans fell not because of the intellectual development that produced the Roman law, not because of education, oratory, literature, and wealth, but because of the idleness, weakness, vice, corruption, which became associated with these things and the loss of honor, courage, vital force, the will to live.

Attila was called "the scourge" not without reason. "The scourge," because he was the instrument for the overrunning of a nation because of her delinquency, her failure to retain vitality, which abides only with morality, cleanness, health, activity, and redness of blood.

May America never cease refining. May America never be scourged. She is now full upon the stage of the world. Will she remain there? It is for us to decide for this and several generations whether she will lose her harmony of development, her self-preserving elements, and be forced off the stage of humanity's progress, either by a raw race or by a civilized power with a will to conquer; or whether she will hold fast to her vital forces, retain the iron in her blood, her moral and physical courage, her fighting spirit, the will to live. And stand. Maintain her balance and rise in humanity's service, to heights of glory.

Right alone does not save when pitted against might, but right evolving might will triumph over wrong and might. We must be a civilized, refined Nation whose will will be developed instead of atrophied, whose vitality, dynamic powers, and efficiency will be conserved and intensified simultaneously with advancement in culture and wealth.

Thus only may we endure, and our liberty, our ideals, Americanism be secured to humanity. Thus we will go upward, with mankind, to an ever-increasing, ennobling, and beneficent destiny.

STEAMSHIP "W. I. RADCLIFFE"

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table H. R. 11698, conferring jurisdiction upon certain courts of the United States to hear and determine the claim by the owner of the steamship W. I. Radcliffe against the United States, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments, and concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House bill 11698, with Senate amendments, and concur in the Senate amendments. The Clerk will report the bill and the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendments were agreed to.

MINUTE MEN'S CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD remarks of my own on a constitutional amendment for which I have introduced a bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to extend his own remarks in the RECORD on the subject of a constitutional amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me by the House, I give this brief statement as to a resolution which I have introduced at the request of Frank J. Batcheller, chairman of the national committee of the American Minute Men, providing for an amendment to the Constitution. The Minute Men's organization has now a membership of over 6,000,000, and their amendment has been indorsed by organization whose membership exceeds 15,000,000. It is likely that resolutions backed by this immense constituency will be presented to the next Congress with an appeal for the approval of their proposed constitutional amendment.

This measure would absolutely prohibit appropriations of public money for sectarian schools and other religious institutions and would terminate all controversy over the matter. In the minds of thinking men it would forever remove any real cause of religious controversy from American politics. The measure is in every way eminently just and fair. It treats every religious body exactly alike. The Government, remember, must be the protector of all churches, but it must not be the patron of any.

There is a very real need for the amendment. In several States large amounts of public money are appropriated regularly for sectarian institutions. In several other States frequent attempts are made to secure such grants, many of the efforts being successful. Open demands have been made for State support of sectarian schools in different parts of the country, and actual attempts have been made to secure such appropriations in Rhode Island, Maine, and Illinois, the effort being successful in the last-named State, and hundreds of thousands of dollars being given to the religious schools of one denomination. There is no provision in the National Constitution to prevent sectarian appropriations by Congress whenever the element favoring such grants can secure the necessary votes in this body. These facts have convinced thinking citizens that this great issue must be met by the American people, and I believe that the statesmanlike way to settle the question is by the adoption of the Minute Men amendment.

The American Minute Men, the movement which originated the amendment and which is leading the fight in its behalf, is in no way connected with any other society or organization. It aims to prohibit sectarian appropriations; that and nothing else. It is in no sense of the word narrow, bigoted, or intolerant. It stands for broad, American principles in a broad, American way.

Its present membership is at least 5,000,000, and that membership is composed of men and women of the highest possible standing.

This amendment, which has been indorsed by civic, religious, and patriotic organizations all over America, is necessary to correct widespread abuses as natural as human nature itself. Of course, no man can object to such a law, except somebody who wants to get his hand in the Public Treasury for his own particular creed. Such an amendment is as fundamental as the very spirit of our Constitution—a spirit, alas, which has often been abused for lack of this specific provision.

If Roger Williams was right in teaching that the State has no right to coerce any person's conscience in the realm of religion, then this constitutional amendment is right in demanding that no man's purse shall be coerced for the sake of promoting another person's sectarian views. Its enactment into law will be the tardy triumph of the very essence of real Americanism.

NATIONAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE FOR AERONAUTICS

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 5544, to increase the membership of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, and I am doing this by direction of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 5544, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the membership of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics is hereby increased from 12 members to 15 members: Provided, That the 3 additional members to be appointed by the President shall be acquainted with the needs of aeronautical science, either civil or military, or skilled in aeronautical engineering or its allied sciences, and shall serve as such without compensation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PENSIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report upon the bill (H. R. 16878) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and so forth, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors, for printing under the rule.

JOINT-STOCK LAND BANKS

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I call up Senate bill 4039, to exempt joint-stock land banks from the provisions of section 8 of the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914, as amended. This bill having been considered by the Committee on Banking and Currency I ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 4039, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is this the same bill the gentleman sought to bring up last night?

Mr. McFADDEN. It is; yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first proviso of the second paragraph of section 8 of the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914, as amended (U. S. C. title 15, ch. 1, sec. 19), is amended to read as follows:

"Provided, That nothing in this section shall apply to mutual savings banks not having a capital stock represented by shares, to joint-stock land banks organized under the provisions of the Federal farm loan act, or to other banking institutions which do no commercial banking business."

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McFADDEN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

IMMIGRATION

The SPEAKER. Under the special order of the House the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON] for 20 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I introduced in the House a measure known as House Resolution No. 341, providing for the appointment of a committee of the House of Representatives for the purpose of investigating and making report on the illegal entrance of aliens into the United States of America, and fixing the responsibility for same.

I desire at this time to send the resolution to the reading clerk and have it read out of my time:

Resolution

Whereas it is estimated by reliable authority that approximately 1,000,000 aliens are now residing in the United States of America who entered our country illegally; and

Whereas it is known that hundreds of thousands of undesirable aliens have been smuggled, or otherwise illegally permitted to enter the United States of America in defiance of law, within the past eight years; and

Whereas such aliens illegally entered into the United States of America have added to the problems of the unemployed, they having displaced American citizens; and

Whereas it is a matter of common knowledge that the hordes of undesirable aliens who have been illegally and fraudulently permitted to enter our borders in recent years have added materially to the wave of crime and increased law violations in America; and

Whereas it is further known that a large persentage of such aliens as have been brought into America illegally within the past few years are engaged in the traffic of narcotics and liquors and are smuggling and bootlegging these unlawful and deadly drugs and liquors to the youth of our land, thereby undermining health, integrity, and moral fiber of the forthcoming generations: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Speaker of this House is hereby authorized and directed to appoint nine Members from the House to act as and to constitute a special investigating committee; that said committee is hereby authorized and directed to immediately institute a thorough investigation to ascertain the facts and conditions concerning the foregoing allegations made, to determine the number of such aliens who have illegally entered the United States within the past eight years, the reasons for their illegal entrance and continued residence herein, and to ascertain the agency or agencies responsible for such conditions; and the aforesaid special committee shall report its findings to the House of Representatives on or before the first Monday in December, 1929, with such recommendations as it may deem advisable.

For the purpose of such investigation this special committee shall have, and is hereby given, the power to meet at such time and places, and to employ such stenographic service to report its hearings, and to make any and all other expenditures, including expenses for traveling, as it may deem necessary. The said special committee is further authorized to sit immediately following the adjournment of the Seventieth Congress, to send for persons and papers, and to provide for all expenses incident thereto, to administer oaths and affirmations, and to take testimony. The chairman of this special committee, designated as such by the Speaker, is hereby authorized and directed to issue subpœnas. In the event this committee holds hearings beyond the bounds and confines of the District of Columbia, the United States marshal of the particular district where such hearings are being held is hereby authorized and directed to serve any and all subpœnas required of him by the said special committee. Any person who willfully refuses to obey any such subpœna and any witness guilty of contumacy shall be reliable to the penalty provided in section 102 of the Revised Statutes.

The Department of Labor, and any and all other departments of the Government, shall cooperate with said committee and, upon request, shall furnish such assistance and information to said committee as will enable it to make a full, complete, and comprehensive report and findings.

All expenses of this special committee incurred under this resolution in making a full, fair, and thorough investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers authorized by said committee, signed by the chairman thereof, and approved by the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. In introducing this resolution in the House of Representatives seeking to have a committee appointed by the House for the purpose of investigating the illegal entry of aliens into the United States, I had only one object in view, and that was to protect this country from a general influx of undesirable aliens in excess of the quotas provided by law.

Certainly no one can question the seriousness of this situation when the daily press is constantly carrying news items to the effect that smuggling and bootlegging are carried on promiscuously throughout the country. Neither can anyone seriously question the fact that there are hundreds of thousands, yes, there have been, in my judgment, according to the best information I can get, more than 1,000,000 aliens admitted illegally and improperly to the United States during the last eight years.

It is not the purpose of the resolution to embarrass anyone in authority, but most certainly the people of the United States are entitled to have their laws administered in a proper manner and to see to it that the officers in charge of law enforcement do their duty as outlined by the Congress of the United States. To hold any other view is contrary to the spirit and intent of our laws and is a rank miscarriage of justice. I have no particular interest in who administers the law, provided the law is properly administered, but as an American citizen and a Representative in Congress I say to you no excuse can be given by any law-enforcement officer for permitting the illegal admission of undesirable aliens into this country.

In my judgment no greater crime can be permitted to exist in America than the promiscuous bootlegging of aliens into the United States. Especially is this true when it is considered from the standpoint of law enforcement. Congress recently voted increased millions in an effort to better enforce prohibition in America, and yesterday the House passed the Jones bill, providing drastic penalties for violations of the dry law. I voted for the bill, hoping it will aid law enforcement. But I submit for your consideration that it will continue to be difficult to have real effective prohibition enforcement when officers and those sworn to uphold the Constitution and laws of the United States permit the illegal entry of more than a million aliens into our borders, many of whom are the scum of the Old World, who have no respect for our laws and who are adding materially to that great army of bootleggers. Many of these undesirable aliens are not only peddling booze but are bootlegging drugs and narcotics and contributing materially to the breaking down of law and order and lax enforcement in many quarters.

Before introducing my resolution to make a thorough investigation as to the number of aliens who have entered the United States I made a rather extensive investigation of the situation. If given an opportunity, I know that I can produce witnesses who will give the Congress information that is really astounding. I think it will be clearly demonstrated by investigation by a proper committee of Congress that not only are aliens bootlegged into the United States in large numbers and pay taken from them for their entry but in a great many instances the people who bootleg them into the country assist in having them deported after they have taken their money from them.

Furthermore, gentlemen of the Congress, I am convinced that undeniable and indisputable evidence can be obtained where aliens have been brought in and paid the price of entry to immigration officers, then robbed of all the remaining money they had in their possession, beaten up, and deported shortly thereafter. I am assured that it can be demonstrated by an investigation that women have been brought into this country, the price paid for their entry in accordance with the custom of those who have been taking bribes for their illegal entry into the United States, that these women have given birth to children shortly after their entry and left stranded, with no money and without proper medical attention.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I will be pleased to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman state where he gets his information?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I am glad the gentleman from Illinois has asked the question, and I assure my distinguished and able friend that I did not make these statements without a thorough investigation, as I stated at the outset. I hold in my hand letters and affidavits from former immigration officials, and I will say to the gentleman I shall be gald to let him see some of them, and will also be delighted to submit same to a proper committee of the Congress. I think I can open the eyes of the gentleman with reference to this deplorable situation.

Mr. SABATH. I will say in reply that the committee, as well as myself, will be delighted and pleased to obtain this information and such evidence, because I know the committee is desirous of putting an end to the practice that it is charged is going on along the borders.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I thank the gentleman, and I again assure him that I will be glad to give him this information and much additional information if he so desires.

I have been assured by men who are willing to testify that they can tell a congressional committee, if they are properly protected, of various cases wherein aliens have been bootlegged into the country, where bribes have been accepted, and where reports have been made to the authorities and no action taken. As an instance of this deplorable, damnable condition, I have a case in mind—and I think the accuracy of the statement can be established without any question of doubt—where immigration inspectors have watched the smuggling of aliens, liquor, and morphine into the country in wholesale lots, and where the authorities were notified by immigration inspectors who could not be bribed that on certain dates smuggling boats would arrive at certain points, and instead of the authorities taking proper precaution to prevent the illegal entry of these aliens into the country, as well as the liquor and dope, they were permitted to land unmolested, unload their cargo of aliens, liquor, and narcotics, despite the fact that those in authority had advance information that these boats would enter.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Yes; I shall be pleased to yield again to the gentleman.

Mr. SABATH. This is a very serious charge against the Department of Labor and the immigration inspectors and officials, and in view of the fact that the gentleman states that he has the evidence, I think he ought to put it in the RECORD. We ought to know about it. We are entitled to have the information.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I shall be glad to give the gentleman and the committee and the House information concerning this and many other matters if they will permit me to appear before a proper committee. I could bring witnesses here within one hour. I have talked with them and I have some of their affidavits. All I am asking now is a chance to be heard and call witnesses before an investigating committee.

Mr. SABATH. Whenever the gentleman is ready, I will assure him that we will endeavor to call a meeting of the committee and give him the opportunity he seeks, and I am only regretful he has not made the request before to-day.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I will be glad to yield, provided I may be assured of a little more time. I only have 20 minutes, and I want to give the Congress what information I can in the limited time given me. I have considerable information that is more astounding than any I have yet given you.

Mr. GIFFORD. I simply want to ask the gentleman if he has referred this information to the proper executive departments previous to bringing it here seeking an investigation, and also ask him if that is not the proper place for such information to go in the first instance?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I will say to the gentleman that I did not secure all the information I have in my possession until yesterday, but I think it is proper to call the attention of the House and of the country to the fact that I have introduced this resolution and have asked to appear before a proper committee and produce my witnesses. Gentlemen, I have them in abundance. Moreover, I am very much of the opinion that the proper departments have in their possession much of the evidence given me. Just why no action has been taken I am at a loss to understand.

I am also advised on what I have reason to consider reliable authority that as many as 150 aliens, to say nothing of the liquor and narcotics, have been landed within a very few days at one given point.

I have no doubt that substantially these further facts can be demonstrated, that when new immigration officers are assigned to certain points they will be immediately approached with the advice that they can have a high-powered car and go on the pay roll for much more money per week than they receive from the Government if they will only "keep their mouths shut" or be away from the docks at certain times when the boats arrive. If these men do not see fit to accept the terms of the alien bootleggers and have a sense of justice and decency and proper respect for their oaths of office, I am told they are either removed or some kind of complaint is filed against them. If they, in turn, seek to report these infamous, scandalous, and outrageous cases of violation of the law to a higher authority, they are dismissed from the service, so my informants declare, or threatened to be beaten up, if not actually beaten for doing so. If given an opportunity I can produce before an investigating committee men who will not only testify that they have been threatened to be beaten up for making reports of illegal entry of aliens into the country, but I am sure we can produce witnesses who were assigned to beat them up if they did not accept the terms.

Mr. BROWNING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Certainly I will yield to my good friend the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BROWNING].

Mr. BROWNING. I would like to ask the gentleman in that connection why a resort to the courts has not been had if such a condition prevails. I am very much interested in the gentleman's statement.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I am delighted that the gentleman has asked the question. I was just coming to that very thought. I will say to the gentleman that I yield to no one in my respect for the courts, but it is very difficult for an honest immigration official to get a square deal when he is "framed" by these law violators, these gangs of criminals who have no regard for law, for their oaths, and who delight in railroading honest officials to the penitentiary.

Mr. SABATH. If the gentleman has the information, I would appreciate it if he will put in the RECORD the number of such inspectors that have been discharged because they have failed to cooperate with the bootleggers, or any additional evidence he may have; and let me suggest to the gentleman that I know something about this information that comes to Members a few days before an immigration bill is taken up on the floor of the House, and I want to say that you can not always rely on all the "dope" they send out, because most of the time such people can not prove their statements.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I am pleased to assure the gentleman that I have asked my informants to reduce their statements to writing and, if possible, to affidavits. I have some of their affidavits and signed statements. I have promises of others that they will be delighted to give, if properly protected, before a proper committee—information that will astound the gentleman and shock the entire country. [Applause.]

Let us suppose a case, and I have reasons to believe that if this committee is appointed and makes proper investigations that it can uncover just such cases: Inspector A is an honest man, and he catches 5, 10, or even 15 aliens who have illegally entered the country and who have paid the price, whatever it may be—perhaps from $200 to $1,000 per alien—and the aliens are taken into court. Inspector A brings charges against them for illegal entry and incidently in these charges says Inspector B permitted the illegal entry into the country. The aliens in all probability will be instructed to plead guilty of having come into the country, and have as their defense that they paid the price required of them to be admitted; and when the court asks them to whom they paid the bootleg money, they are instructed to say they paid it to Inspector A, who made the arrest, and identify Inspector A as the man to whom they paid the graft.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LAGUARDIA). The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is making a very informative address, in which we are all interested, and I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended for a period of 10 minutes.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, we have a lot of matters to take up to-day. Would the gentleman just as soon extend the rest of his remarks?

Mr. GARBER. The gentleman seldom addresses the House and certainly does not abuse the privilege of the House, and I would consider it a personal favor if the gentleman from New York would permit this extension of time.

Mr. SNELL. We have to adjourn at 4.30 for the Democratic caucus. I do not want to cut the gentleman off, but I hope he will not go longer than the 10 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I promise the gentleman I will not continue longer than 10 additional minutes, and I would not ask for any extension of time if I had not been interrupted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. GARBER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Let us see. I believe I was discussing a case I have in mind of Inspectors A and B. May I not inquire in what kind of a position would Inspector A, the honest, faithful officer, find himself, under circumstances I related before being interrupted. Of course, the aliens would be deported, because they have plead guilty, but what about honest Inspector A who caught the aliens? Where do you suppose he would land as a result of his experience in the United States court? Or let us suppose that the aliens who have been caught, after they have paid the price, do not identify the inspector who made the arrest as the one who received the graft, but instead identify some prominent citizen, who may be in the court, or suppose some citizen who has interested himself in trying to break up an alien bootleg ring? These aliens will in all probability be instructed to name him as the one to whom they paid the graft and the court sends for this citizen and brings him before the judge, when these aliens positively identify this man as the one who accepted the bribe for their illegal entry. What happens to this public-spirited citizen in cases of this kind? I am quite sure that it would be a good guess to predict that he would take a trip to Atlanta or elsewhere for a forced vacation. I have heard of just such a case and perhaps if the committee is appointed we can produce some citizens who have served terms in Atlanta for just such cases as this.

Let us take another case. Suppose this committee in making its investigation as proposed in my resolution should find that men are willing to testify to the fact that they were the parties acting as immigration officers who were instructed by higher officers to act as a clearing house and accept for the ring the money paid by the aliens for illegal entry into the country? Could anyone say that if such evidence of flagrant violation of the law were disclosed as a result of this investigation that the efforts of Congress in making the investigation would be useless?

If by chance we were able to uncover, in our efforts to give clean government, the fact that when reports are made by officers who had some regard for their oath of office and some regard for common decency and the best interests of our common country, when they fail to get proper cooperation from district inspectors or other higher authorities, to the authorities in Washington, these reports instead of being investigated by the proper authority were forwarded to other district inspectors, who in turn forwarded them to the district inspector guilty of having been engaged in the business of bootlegging, and the man or men making reports of these flagrant violations of the law were told that if they made any more reports except through the regular channels they would be bumped off, beaten up, or something of that kind, would not such investigation have any effect on relieving this horrible situation?

Or let us presume a still further case. Suppose it were to develop, in an investigation, that when district inspectors or other inspectors are checked up and found remiss in their duties, or even guilty of accepting or knowing that bribes are accepted, and when such facts became known instead of being dismissed from the service they were transferred to other posts where they could ply their dastardly trade in a more remunerative manner and where opportunities for compensation were more alluring. Do you not feel, gentlemen, if this and other similar and even worse cases can be proven, that it would be worth the while to pursue an investigation of this character, in order that the Congress and the country may know just what is going on and those in higher authority may be convinced of the dire need for improvement and a general shake-up in several quarters. [Applause.]

It can not be said that I have ulterior motives in pressing a question of this kind. It is a well-known fact that many aliens have been admittedly illegally entered into the United States during the last eight years, and I assume that the new administration would surely welcome an investigation as to why these conditions exist. We are supposed to have an outstanding genius who is about to enter upon his arduous duties at the head of the Government, who, we hope and believe, will refuse to tolerate such deplorable and damnable conditions. It is not a party matter at all. It is a matter worthy the consideration of our people, as well as that of the Congress of the United States. I, therefore, express the hope that a thorough investigation of these conditions may be had at an early date, and see what can be done to rid the country of one of the blackest crimes in the annals of our Government. [Applause.]

HOSPITALIZATION FOR WORLD WAR VETERANS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the special order the Chair recognizes the lady from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS] for 10 minutes.

Mrs. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I have asked for time to-day in order that I might discuss H. R. 15921, a bill which I reported to the House for the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation last week. This bill authorizes additional hospital, domiciliary, and out-patient facilities for our World War veterans. I wish to tell Members of the House of the greatly overcrowded conditions, not only in our veterans' hospitals but also in the State hospitals. That there is need for beds for the tuberculosis and neuropsychiatric cases in both Federal and State hospitals there is no denying. The situation is most deplorable. The Veterans' Bureau has repeatedly said that there are no unoccupied veterans' hospital beds for neuropsychiatric cases anywhere in the country.

There is also need for tuberculosis beds in certain sections of the country, and there is need for medical and surgical beds in certain sections of the country.

According to the records of the United States Veterans' Bureau on January 31, 1929, the bureau was operating 48 hospitals, using a part of the facilities of 50 other Government hospitals, and 144 civilian hospitals. The patient load in these hospitals was as follows:

TUBERCULOSIS

United States veterans' hospitals	5,380
Public Health Service hospitals	24
Army hospitals	706
Navy hospitals	87
Soldiers' homes	564
Contract hospitals	447
Total, tuberculosis patients	7,208

GENERAL MEDICAL AND SURGICAL

United States veterans' hospitals	3,668
Public Health Service hospitals	386
Army hospitals	1,135
Navy hospitals	2,141
Soldiers' homes	400
Contract hospitals	211
Total, general medical and surgical cases	7,941

NEUROPSYCHIATRIC

United States veterans' hospitals	10,945
Army hospitals	189
Navy hospitals	316
Soldiers' homes	662
St. Elizabeths	347
Contract hospitals	1,160
Total, neuropsychiatric patients	13,619

SUMMARY

The grand total for the above three classes of patients is:

United States veterans' hospitals	19,993
Public Health Service hospitals	410
Army hospitals	2,030
Navy hospitals	2,544
Soldiers' homes	1,626
St. Elizabeths	347
Contract hospitals	1,818
Making a total patient load of	28,768

These figures, as before stated, show the patient load of the United States Veterans' Bureau as of January 31, 1929. As of this same date the total capacity of the United States veterans' hospitals was 21,805, with additional facilities in process of building of 1,007. The average number of beds occupied during the month of January, 1929, was 19,601.

The hospital-construction program submitted by the United States Veterans' Bureau follows:

Hospital-construction program submitted by United States Veterans' Bureau

Location	Type	Beds	Cost	Purpose
Bedford, Mass.	Neuropsychiatric	150	$360,000	Continued-treatment building; additional staff and attendants' quarters.

Western New York State.	Neuropsychiatric	400	1,700,000	New hospital with facilities for a limited number of general cases to supplement the general beds contemplated at Aspinwall, Pa., and facilities for regional office.
Augusta, Ga.	General	138	300,000	Acute building.
Alabama	do	250	1,100,000	New hospital and facilities for regional office.
Gulfport, Miss.	Neuropsychiatric	138	340,000	Acute building; additional quarters.

Location	Type	Beds	Cost	Purpose
Indiana	General [1]	150	$500,000	New hospital (exclusive of personnel quarters) and facilities for regional office.
North Chicago	Neuropsychiatric	150	280,000	Additional beds and quarters for personnel.
Knoxville, Iowa [1]	do	150	270,000	Continued-treatment building.
Albuquerque, N. Mex.	General [1]	250	1,250,000	New hospital and facilities for regional office.
San Francisco, Calif.	do.[1]	200	1,000,000	New hospital with facilities for diagnostic center and regional office.
Tucson, Ariz	Tuberculosis	100	280,000	Additional beds and quarters.
Texas	Neuropsychiatric	300	1,200,000	New hospital and facilities for regional office.
Total		3,576	[2]11,480,000

[1] Facilities will be provided for all 3 types of cases with beds for general condition predominant.

[2] To offset the expenditures called for by the above program the bureau proposes to secure legislation authorizing the sale of the hospital properties at the Bronx, N. Y., Dwight, Ill., and Waukesha, Wis., which it is conservatively estimated will result in the return of not less than $3,750,000 to the credit of miscellaneous receipts, Treasury Department. In addition, it is estimated that the sum of $2,000,000 will be saved to the Federal Government through the return of the hospital property at Fort Bayard, N. Mex., to the War Department for the purpose of housing a regiment of troops. Savings of approximately $143,000 annually will also be effected through the proposed evacuation of the space now reserved in leased buildings for the regional offices at New York, N. Y.; San Francisco, Calif.; Albuquerque, N. Mex.; Indianapolis, Ind.; and possibly Dallas, Tex. The regional offices at Buffalo, N. Y., and Birmingham, Ala., are occupying space in Government-owned buildings.

It will be noted that the program of the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau is largely to provide additional facilities for neuropsychiatric cases and that while four of the projects mentioned are designated as hospitals of the general type, these facilities will provide for all three types of cases with beds for general medical and surgical cases predominating. The director of the bureau when appearing before the committee stated that the bureau's experience has shown that it is desirable to provide in each general hospital a certain number of beds for neuropsychiatric cases and a certain number of beds for tubercular cases. The wards might be termed as clearing houses. It is to such hospitals that suspected neuropsychiatric or tubercular cases will be sent. Their condition will be carefully studied and, if possible, a recovery made. If, after intensive treatment, it is determined that the disease will be of long duration, or that recovery within a reasonable time may not be had, the plan is to then send the patient to an institution for the care of such cases alone.

It will be noted that tubercular facilities are provided for at Tucson, Ariz. As is well known, there is already existing a large tubercular hospital at that point and the additional beds and quarters provided for herein are absolutely necessary to take care of the present load.

It is the plan of the bureau to offset the expenditures authorized by this bill upon the completion of the program by securing legislation authorizing the sale of the hospital properties at the Bronx, N. Y., Dwight, Ill., and Waukesha, Wis., which, it is conservatively estimated by the director of the bureau, will result in the return of not less than $3,750,000 to the credit of miscellaneous receipts, Treasury Department. In addition, it is estimated that upon the completion of the program the hospital property at Fort Bayard, N. Mex., may be returned to the War Department for the purpose of housing troops which would result in a probable saving to the Federal Government of $2,000,000. Savings of approximately $143,000 annually will also be effected through the proposed evacuation of the space now reserved in leased buildings for the regional offices at New York, N. Y., San Francisco, Calif., Albuquerque, N. Mex., Indianapolis, Ind., and, possibly, Dallas, Tex. The regional offices at Buffalo, N. Y., and Birmingham, Ala., are occupying space in Government-owned buildings.

The savings, in so far as the regional offices are concerned, will be immediate upon the completion of this program, as it has been recommended by the bureau, and in adopting the program your committee agrees that sufficient space in the administration buildings of such hospitals should be allotted to house the activities of the regional offices. In so far as the sale of the properties mentioned is concerned, your committee did not feel it proper to include in the present bill any authority, as experience may show upon the completion of this program, as has been the case with others, that the patient load of the Veterans' Bureau will not permit the immediate disposal of such plants.

The director of the bureau has informed the committee that, due to the fact that the bureau had not planned on presenting a program at this session of Congress and to the limited time available for the preparation of a program, it was not possible, as has been customary, for the bureau to submit its recommendations to the Federal Board of Hospitalization for the consideration of that agency. However, your committee had before it the Director of the Veterans' Bureau, the representatives of the various service organizations, many Members of both Houses of Congress, as well as others, all of whom submitted data showing the need for the projects authorized herein.

It must be kept in mind that there are at present 55,000 mentally afflicted World War veterans whose disabilities are connected with the service, and for which they are now in receipt of compensation. Yet less than one-fourth of these veterans—10,500—are now in Veterans' Bureau hospitals receiving Government care and treatment. What of the other 40,000 veterans mentally afflicted as a result of the war? Are they to be denied Government treatment and cure, because we have failed to build hospitals for their care?

The condition of many of these 40,000 veterans is growing steadily worse. Soon thousands of them will require hospitalization, and the Government should be prepared to do its duty by them by constructing hospitals for their treatment and cure when needed.

Congress, under the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended, in section 202–10, has made mandatory the hospitalization of all T. B. and N. P. cases.

Some Members of the House feel, I know, that the States rather than the Federal Government should pay for the care of the nonservice-connected cases. Whether that is true or not, whether they are right in their opinions or not, I think we are all agreed that either the State or the Federal Government should care for the disabled veterans that need hospitalization. The Federal Government called the men to arms; the Federal Government should hospitalize our men before it is too late.

I have an idea that it may be possible to get the States at a later date to pay or help pay for the care of our nonservice-connected cases in veterans' hospitals. In the meantime, we need beds desperately and should build Veterans' Bureau hospitals. I have not time to read the telegrams from different State hospitals and from commissioners of health of different States, proving that there is hospital overcrowding, but I ask unanimous consent that they be inserted at this time and which are as follows:

BOARD OF CONTROL, STATE INSTITUTIONS OF IOWA,
By E. J. HINES, Secretary.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1927, there were 71,967 veterans hospitalized by the Veterans' Bureau. This number increased to 73,270 during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1928.

The American Legion at Denver, Colo., reports that there are 41 service-connected cases awaiting hospitalization at Denver.

The American Legion at Boston reported to-day that 42 service-connected cases of mental disability have been refused hospitalization within the past month due to lack of beds; that 177 202 (10) mental cases are now awaiting hospitalization there; and that there are in addition 154 mental cases in State hospitals eligible for transfer to Government hospitals for whom no claims have been filed.

The Veterans' Bureau corroborates this.

The Dallas (Tex.) regional office reports that there are 30 men now awaiting beds—4 service-connected cases and the remainder 202-10 cases, which are mandatory for hospitalization and should be counted as service connected. Six of this number are hospitalized in county jails.

We must face the fact that to care for intelligently veterans of all wars is a very big problem. I am going to ask that a board be appointed, nonpolitical and nonpartisan, and if possible a nonsalaried board, to study the whole veterans' problem and make a report as to what is needed to adequately care for the veterans and as to the best method of so doing.

Mr. BROWNING. Will the lady yield?

Mrs. ROGERS. I will yield a little later.

Statistics show at the present time that there are 1,100 service-connected cases awaiting hospitalization, and they are entitled to hospitalization in the Veterans' Bureau hospitals. Section 202 (10) of the act of 1926 as amended made mandatory the hospitalization of neuropsychiatric and tubercular cases, and certain other cases should be treated exactly as if they were service connected in the matter of hospitalization. I will quote that section:

SEC. 202-10, World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended: That all hospital facilities under the control and jurisdiction of the bureau shall be available for every honorably discharged veteran of the Spanish-American War, the Philippine insurrection, the Boxer rebellion, or the World War suffering from neuropsychiatric or tubercular ailments and diseases, paralysis agitans, encephalitis lethargica, or amoebic dysentery, or the loss of sight of both eyes, regardless whether such ailments or diseases are due to military service or otherwise, including traveling expenses as granted to those receiving compensation and hospitalization under this act. The director is further authorized, so far as he shall find that existing Government facilities permit, to furnish hospitalization and necessary traveling expenses incident to hospitalization to veterans of any war, military occupation, or military expedition, incuding those women who served as Army nurses under contracts between April 21, 1898, and February 2, 1901, not dishonorably discharged, without regard to the nature or origin of their disabilities: Provided, That any and all laws applicable to women who belonged to the Nurse Corps of the Army after February 2, 1901, shall apply equally to members of the Army Nurse Corps who served under contract between April 21, 1898, and February 2, 1901, including all women who served honorably as nurses, chief nurses, or superintendent of said corps in said period: Provided, That preference to admission to any Government hospital for hospitalization under the provisions of this subdivision shall be given to those veterans who are financially unable to pay for hospitalization and their necessary traveling expenses: Provided further, That where a veteran hospitalized under the authority of this subdivision is financially unable to supply himself with clothing, he shall also be furnished with such clothing as the director may deem necessary: Provided further, That where a veteran entitled to hospitalization under this subdivision is suffering with a disease or injury necessitating the wearing of a prosthetic appliance and is financially unable to supply himself with same, upon an affidavit to that effect the director is hereby authorized to furnish such appliance and to effect necessary repairs to the same without cost to the veteran: And provided further, That the pension of a veteran entitled to hospitalization under this subdivision shall not be subject to deduction, while such veteran is hospitalized in any Government hospital, for board, maintenance, or any other purpose incident to hospitalization: Provided further, That the act of May 4, 1898, entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for other purposes," the act of February 28, 1861, as amended by the act of February 2, 1909, relative to the Government hospital for the insane in the District of Columbia, or any other act, in so far as they are inconsistent with the provisions of this section, be, and they are, hereby modified accordingly.

In the insular possessions or Territories of the United States the director is further authorized to furnish hospitalization in other than Government hospitals.

The doctors in this House know only too well that prompt diagnosis, prompt hospitalization, means a saving not only of human life but it means a saving of reason. I feel I have a right to speak of this fact because I have worked in the hospitals. I worked steadily in hospitals from 1918 to 1922. I have watched the care of veterans in the hospitals in different parts of the country since then. I saw then what prompt care did in curing these service men and women, and I also saw how as a result of lack of care some of them become hopeless cases. Take a diabetic, for instance. At the present time, since the discovery of insulin, if he is promptly hospitalized, promptly diagnosed, he is taught to have the proper diet, taught the proper care, and he can go out in the world and earn his living for himself and for his family. Immediate care of a mental case often means that the patient is brought back to normal. Certainly from the economic point of view it is important to diagnose these men promptly, to hospitalize them promptly. It is much better for the men to have them get well and it is much better for the families to have them get well, and also for the Federal Government. They are, then, not a financial drain upon the Government.

This bill (H. R. 15921) provides approximately 3,500 beds for our disabled veterans in the different parts of the country. The program which goes with the bill, which is inserted in the committee's report of the bill, is recommended by the Director of the Veterans' Bureau as being the one he favors at this time. I am not completely satisfied with it because I believe we need beds in certain other parts of the country that he has not recommended. He has stated that while no appropriation could possibly pass the House and the Senate during this session of Congress, yet if he had the authorization to go ahead and plan to build these hospitals, there would be a great saving of time in their erection.

The Veterans' Bureau states that it takes nearly three years to complete a building program. This statement, however, is not borne out by an analysis of the actual facts. It should be recognized that if a program were to be completed within three years, that the average date upon which all of the hospitals included in the program were to be opened would necessarily be less than three years. For example, if the entire program were to be completed within three years, the first hospital must have been completed within, say, 18 months and the remaining hospitals completed at intervals every few months thereafter until the completion of the last hospital within the 3-year limit.

An analysis has just been made of the dates on which the last 10 Veterans' Bureau hospitals have been opened. This analysis shows that it takes three years, on the average, from the date of authorization to the completion date of a hospital, and does not in any sense represent the time for completion of a hospital building program.

The 10 last hospitals opened by the Veterans' Bureau, from which this study has been made, are listed below, showing the name of the hospital, the date of its authorization, the date of its completion, the elapsed time between authorization and completion and the number of beds involved.

Name and No.	Date authorized	Date completed	Time from authorization to completion	Number of beds
St. Cloud, 101	April, 1922	September, 1924	2 years 5 months	340
Excelsior Springs, 99	do	October, 1924	2 years 6 months	125
Camp Custer, 100	do	do	do	575
Livermore, 102	do	April, 1925	3 years	306
Aspinwall, 103	March, 1921	October, 1925	4 years 7 months	228
San Fernando, 104	April, 1922	March, 1926	3 years 11 months	230
North Chicago, 105	June, 1924	do	1 year 9 months	700
Minneapolis, 106	do	April, 1927	2 years 10 months	557
Northport, 108	do	April, 1928	3 years 10 months	1,000
Bedford, 107	March, 1925	July, 1928	3 years 4 months	350

It took 30 years and 8 months to complete these 10 hospitals, or an average of 3 years for each hospital. The average bed capacity of each of these hospitals is 441 beds, in other words, average-sized hospitals.

The last 10 hospitals opened were chosen arbitrarily to obtain the average time of construction, for several reasons, as follows:

First. The Veterans' Bureau architectural and engineering corps is now working at higher efficiency than in the beginning, so their latest efforts form a better medium of comparison than would their earlier efforts.

Second. Ten hospitals were chosen arbitrarily, as this would give a sufficient number from which to strike a fair average time for the construction of one hospital under present conditions.

The 4,411 beds involved approximate the size of the average program authorized by the Congress.

Third. Of the hospitals opened at an earlier date many were buildings which had not been erected for hospital use but which were purchased by the Government and transformed into hospitals for use of the disabled veterans. Others were purchased outright. For this reason an analysis of the elapsed time between authorization and opening of the earlier hospitals would not be a true indication of the time it takes to build a hospital, it now being the Veterans' Bureau policy to construct the hospitals authorized by the Congress.

The present program will not be adequate to hospitalize all veterans in Veterans' Bureau hospitals. It is felt that with these additional facilities and the continued use of the beds now allotted to the bureau by other governmental agencies the Veterans' Bureau will be in a position to take care during the next several years of practically all service-connected cases and the more aggravated 202—10 cases.

In approving the program submitted by the director, there is no intention on the part of the committee to designate a particular location for hospitals. It is expected to place the structures in the areas set out herein at such places as the director may select, but if conditions should be so altered as to require changes in location or allocation, it is expected that the director, with the approval of the Federal board for hospitalization and the President, will make such changes.

This bill has been indorsed by the American Legion, the Disabled American Veterans, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Spanish War Veterans, and the Grand Army of the Republic. The suggestions of these veterans' organizations have been very helpful as they constantly make surveys of the hospitalization problem. While your committee did not see fit to recommend all that these organizations requested, it did attempt to fill the greatest need.

I have taken at random the 10 last hospital projects. They have averaged three years a project. You can imagine what three years means to a sick veteran if he is waiting for hospitalization. The Legion tells me, and I know from my own experience, that it takes frequently from one to three months to secure hospitalization for a veteran, and then it is necessary, often, to have a Member of Congress telegraph to secure that hospitalization. The veteran should be hospitalized the day that he is taken sick.

There is one thing I think most of us do not take into consideration, and that is the transportation costs to the Government if the hospitals are at a considerable distance from the veteran's home. Last year the veterans expended over $2,000,000 in transportation. Last year the hospital bill authorized for the building of beds an appropriation of $15,000,000. That money has already been appropriated, and every cent of it the Director of the Veterans' Bureau tells me has been allocated. Seven million dollars was appropriated by Congress immediately after the passage of the bill last year. And this session of Congress appropriated $6,000,000, and granted to the bureau authority to obligate the remaining $2,000,000. I speak of this because, on the floor, it was said that was $2,000,000 available which the director could use for hospital projects. The Veterans' Bureau has told me several times that every cent of the $2,000,000 is allocated, every cent of it obligated. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, it is my intention in a few moments to move to suspend the rules and pass H. R. 16819, and pending that motion I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes upon the question of hospitalization for disabled veterans.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I make the request to couple with that that I have five minutes, to follow the gentleman from South Dakota.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi couples with that a request that he may have five minutes. Is there objection to these requests?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, like every other Member of the House, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the address concerning hospitals made by the distinguished lady from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS], and like every other Member of the House, and I know that to be a certainty, having served here for 11 years since the war, I desire to see every disabled soldier in the United States given hospitalization. The whole matter of veterans' legislation presents many problems to the Congress and to the country. The legislation with reference to compensation and that with reference to hospitalization must be considered together. We have entered this hospital-building program rather gradually. The sum total of appropriations for the building of hospitals since the war is approximately $90,000,000, which means that for each service-connected disabled patient in Veterans' Bureau hospitals in the United States the Government has expended $7,000.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. No; not until I finish this statement. The total load in all hospitals to-day is approximately 29,000 men. We started out with the theory that we would give hospital treatment to every service-connected person who was disabled in the war, but in the veterans' act of 1924 we found that there were some vacant beds not required for service men, which could be used by those who were not disabled in the war. Congress passed this act:

> The director is further authorized, so far as he shall find that existing Government facilities permit, to furnish hospitalization and necessary traveling expenses incident to hospitalization of veterans * * * without regard to the nature or origin of their disability.

So that the existing law to-day is that every ex-service man of the World War who has a service-connected disability mandatorily must be hospitalized, and if there are vacant beds these men who have non-service-connected disabilities may be hospitalized. For instance, men who last year were run over by an automobile or to-day become diseased may be hospitalized. That is existing law. This has been the final result: We have 29,000 men in the hospitals and 10,000 of them have non-service-connected disabilities; so that if they were removed from the hospitals, as contemplated by the existing law, whether it was wise or not, there would be plenty of beds available for the service-connected men.

I call your attention to this largely because I know that the time is now here when Congress must not only consider this matter in connection with a general hospital policy but in connection also with a policy of pensions. In that connection I wish to call attention to report No. 2715 which accompanies the bill H. R. 15921, discussed by the lady from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS], and also call attention to the minority views. They are called "minority views" because that is the only way we can file them. But as a matter of fact I do not think there will be any disagreement eventually among the responsible Members of Congress and the responsible service men and citizens of the country as to what must be done. But before this program is carried out, and before we make commitments and agreements, we ought to know where we are going to get the money, and what should be done with it, and how the men will be treated.

All I desire to do in this short time that I have is to call the attention of the House to the great problem and to see that Members do not commit themselves to a policy that may be found to be unsound. When we do agree upon a policy we ought to let the ex-service men and the taxpayers know what we promise, and then live up to that promise.

I happened to be on the floor of the House 12 years ago, when war was declared, and I happened to be on the floor when we passed the conscription law; and I still remember those fluent speeches made by gentlemen who insisted on our entering the war unprepared as to what would be done with the men who would be injured. It is not my duty to definitely determine what will be done with the men, but it is up to us to make a comprehensive study before we decide upon a program.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I will yield first to the member of the committee, the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BROWNING. Is not the law now absolutely mandatory that we hospitalize every disabled veteran?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. The gentleman, as usual, is correct in the statement of the law with reference to these two classes. As to the non-service-connected cases, if they were taken from the hospitals, we would have room for the classes of patients to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. BROWNING. Are there not numbers of those men who can not get hospitalization?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Yes; non-service-connected cases. If the hospital bill is passed—and I have said frankly in the minority views that I did not think it would pass——

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. In a moment. And time has demonstrated that I was right, because in my opinion we have not a chance to pass it. Even if it passed this body it would not become law. If we did pass this hospital bill there would be no opportunity afforded to procure the money necessary for the building of the hospitals until July 1, 1930. I have every confidence that this administration must recognize the fact that there must be a consolidation of activities affecting the ex-service men, instead of having five different operating heads, including hospitalization and everything else. We must use some plain, ordinary common sense in this governmental matter and put all these activities under one head, and then we could intelligently appropriate the money that may be necessary. There are 11 or 12 soldiers' homes, and the patient load may be entirely different a year or six months from now from what it is to-day.

Mrs. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mrs. ROGERS. I suppose the gentleman realizes that the Director of the Veterans' Bureau has repeatedly stated that we would not have enough beds even if those of the soldiers' homes were taken over by the Veterans' Bureau?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I have been so informed by ladies and gentlemen who have talked with the Director of the Veterans' Bureau, but I must depend for his attitude upon the statements he makes when he comes before the committee as a witness. He has never made that statement to the committee or to me.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. BROWNING. Can the gentleman tell us why he is so positive that this bill can not pass the Senate?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I do not want to go into that, but experience here has taught me that certain bills can go through without being fought, and certain others will not pass. I do not believe the gentleman and myself will disagree on what eventually ought to be done.

Mr. BROWNING. If we had the same unanimity of view in the House as there is in the committee, the gentleman would think, would he not, that there would be an overwhelming vote in favor of the bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I can not go into that. I can not answer the gentleman's question without violating the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from South Dakota has expired.

COWPENS BATTLE GROUND

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, by authority of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and at the request of the author of the bill, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table H. R. 12106, to erect a national monument at Cowpens battle ground, with Senate amendments, and concur in the Senate amendments. The Senate amendments are very much more favorable to the Treasury of the United States, and we desire to end the matter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House bill 12106 with Senate amendments and concur in the Senate amendments. The Clerk will report the bill and Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendments were agreed to.

JOHN F. FLEMING

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, by authority of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table H. R. 12650, granting an honorable discharge to John F. Fleming, with a Senate amendment, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House bill 12650, with a Senate amendment, and concur in the same. The Clerk will report the bill and the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

HOSPITALIZATION FOR WORLD WAR VETERANS

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I thoroughly agree with the lady from Massachusetts that we ought to pass the hospital bill reported from the Veterans' Committee. I submit, Mr. Speaker, in answer to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] who says it has not a chance to pass, that if it is given an opportunity to pass it will pass this House and the other body and receive the signature of the President.

The sentiment in favor of this legislation is overwhelming. It is recommended by the American Legion; it is recommended by the Disabled American Veterans; it is recommended by every veterans' organization that has investigated the hospital situation; it has the approval of the Veterans' Bureau, and it has the approval of the Veterans' Committee, of which the gentleman from South Dakota is the chairman. They indorsed it by a vote of almost 4 to 1 on a record vote.

Why, then, should we be denied the opportunity of bringing this bill before the House? He says we could not get the money for some time. But we want to begin making arrangements for the construction or expansion of these hospitals in order that by the time the money can be appropriated we will be ready to proceed with their construction.

The gentleman from South Dakota says we are taking care of men now whose disabilities are not service connected. He knows that in the beginning I was one man, if not the only man, on the committee who opposed embarking upon that policy. But we have embarked upon it now, and even the gentleman from South Dakota will not stand on this floor and say he is willing to back off from it, and to throw these men out into the cold who are now in the various hospitals.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. For a question; yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. It would be difficult to make it a question. I will have to make a statement. I will say I would favor the policy of putting all veterans who have service-connected disabilities in hospitals and to equalize the States, fixing a percentage of non-service connected cases that could be admitted to each hospital.

Mr. RANKIN. I can not yield for a speech, Mr. Speaker. The time has now come when we need space, when we need new hospitals, and when we need these hospitals expanded. The Director of the Veterans' Bureau tells you that in the program he has submitted the hospitals are in localities where the increases in the load are going to be greatest in the years to come.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does the proposed bill specify a set and limited program?

Mr. RANKIN. If the gentleman from Washington will read the report, he will find that in that report the committee has inserted the tentative program as recommended by the Veterans' Bureau. It includes the hospitals we want to construct or expand, and in those localities where they are most necessary to take care of the disabled veterans we are not able to take care of now.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And where is the program that will lead to further needed hospital construction? Will we not need still another program? Do we not need it now?

Mr. RANKIN. Certainly! Wars always lead to disabled soldiers, and if a government does its duty disabled soldiers lead to hospitals and caring for those men when they break down as a result of their war services. [Applause.]

Mr. BROWNING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. BROWNING. I will ask the gentleman if he does not think there are really thousands of these sick men who have never been service connected by the bureau, but who are absolutely disabled because of their service connection?

Mr. RANKIN. Absolutely; and there is your trouble. You have a great deal of technical red tape by which men are being denied compensation, and as a result many of those men who are now suffering for the want of compensation or hospitalization are suffering from service-connected disabilities. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

WORLD WAR VETERANS' LEGISLATION

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 16819) to amend the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill H. R. 16819, as amended. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16819) to amend the World War veterans' act, 1924

Be it enacted, etc., That section 16 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended (sec. 442, title 38, U. S. C.), is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 16. All sums heretofore appropriated for the military and naval insurance appropriation and all premiums collected for the yearly renewable term insurance provided by the provisions of title 3 deposited and covered into the Treasury to the credit of this appropriation shall, where unexpended, be made available for the bureau. All premiums that may hereafter be collected for the yearly renewable term insurance provided by the provisions of title 3 hereof shall be deposited and covered into the Treasury for the credit of this appropriation. Such sum, including all premium payments, is made available for the payment of the liabilities of the United States incurred under contracts of yearly renewable term insurance made under the provisions of title 3, including the refund of premiums and such liabilities as shall have been or shall hereafter be reduced to judgment in a district court of the United States or in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. Payments from this appropriation shall be made upon and in accordance with the awards by the director."

SEC. 2. That section 19 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended (sec. 445, title 38, U. S. C.), be hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 19. In the event of disagreement as to claim, including claim for refund of premiums, under a contract of insurance between the bureau and any person or persons claiming thereunder, an action on the claim may be brought against the United States either in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia or in the district court of the United States in and for the district in which such persons, or any one of them, resides, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon such courts to hear and determine all such controversies. The procedure in such suits shall be the same as that provided in sections 5 and 6 of the act entitled 'An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the Government of the United States,' approved March 3, 1887, and section 10 thereof in so far as applicable. All persons having or claiming to have an interest in such insurance may be made parties to such suit, and such as are not inhabitants of or found within the district in which suit is brought may be brought in by order of the court, to be served personally or by publication or in such other reasonable manner as the court may direct. In all cases where the bureau acknowledges the indebtedness of the United States upon any such contract of insurance and there is a dispute as to the person or persons entitled to payment, a suit in the nature of a bill of interpleader may be brought by the bureau in the name of the United States against all persons having or claiming to have any interest in such insurance in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia or in the district court in and for the district in which any of such claimants reside: Provided, That not less than 30 days prior to instituting such suit the bureau shall mail a notice of such intention to each of the persons to be made parties to the suit. The circuit courts of appeal and the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia shall respectively exercise appellate jurisdiction and, except as provided in sections 239 and 240 of the Judicial Code, the decrees of the circuit courts of appeal and the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia shall be final. This section shall apply to all suits now pending against the United States under the provisions of the war risk insurance act, as amended, or of the World War veterans' act, 1924, and amendments thereto.

"No suit shall be allowed under this section unless the same shall have been brought within six years after the right accrued for which the claim is made, or within one year from the date of the approval of this amendatory act, whichever is the later date: Provided, That for the purposes of this section it shall be deemed that the right accrued on the happening of the contingency on which the claim is founded: Provided further, That this limitation is suspended for the period elapsing between the filing in the bureau of the claim sued upon and the denial of said claim by the director. Infants, insane persons, or persons under other legal disability, or persons rated as incompetent or insane by the bureau shall have three years in which to bring suit after the removal of their disabilities. If suit is seasonably begun and fails for defect in process, or for other reasons not affecting the merits, a new action, if one lies, may be brought within a year, though the period of limitations has elapsed. Judgments heretofore rendered against the person or persons claiming under the contract of war-risk insurance on the ground that the claim was barred by the statute of limitations shall not be a bar to the institution of another suit on the same claim. No State or other statute of limitations shall be applicable to suits filed under this section. This section shall apply to all suits now pending against the United States under the provisions of this section.

"In any suit, action, or proceeding brought under the provisions of this act, subpœnas for witnesses who are required to attend a court of the United States in any district may run into any other district: Provided, That no writ of subpœna shall issue for witnesses living out of the district in which the court is held at a greater distance than 100 miles from the place of holding the same without the permission of the court being first had upon proper application and cause shown. The word 'district' and the words 'district court' as used herein shall be construed to include the District of Columbia and the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia.

"Part-time and fee-basis employees of the bureau, in addition to their regular travel and subsistence allowance when ordered in writing by the director to appear as witnesses in suits under this section, may be allowed, within the discretion and under written orders of the director, a fee in an amount not to exceed $20 per day."

SEC. 3. That section 28 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended (sec. 453, title 38, U. S. C.), is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 28. There shall be no recovery of payments from any person who, in the judgment of the director, is without fault on his part, and where, in the judgment of the director, such recovery would defeat the purpose of benefits otherwise authorized or would be against equity and good conscience. No disbursing officer shall be held liable for any amount paid by him to any person where the recovery of such amount is waived under this section.

"When under the provisions of this section the recovery of a payment made from the United States Government life-insurance fund is waived, the United States Government life-insurance fund shall be reimbursed for the amount involved from the current appropriation for military and naval insurance.

"This section, as amended, shall be deemed to be in effect as of June 7, 1924."

SEC. 4. That a new section be added to Title I of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended (title 38, U. S. C.), to be known as section 37, and to read as follows:

"SEC. 37. Checks properly issued to beneficiaries and undelivered for any reason shall be retained in the files of the bureau until such time as delivery may be accomplished, or, until three full fiscal years have elapsed after the end of the fiscal year in which issued."

SEC. 5. That section 201, paragraph (f), of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended (sec. 472, title 38, U. S. C.), be hereby amended to read as follows:

"(f) If there is a dependent mother (or dependent father), $20, or both, $30. The amount payable under this subdivision shall not exceed the difference between the total amount payable to the widow and children and the sum of $75. Such compensation shall be payable, whether the dependency of the father or mother or both arises before or after the death of the person: Provided, That the status of dependency shall be determined annually as of the anniversary date of the approval of the award, and the director is authorized to require a submission of such proof of dependency as he, in his discretion, may deem necessary: Provided further, That upon refusal or neglect of the claimant or claimants to supply such proof of dependency in a reasonable time, the payment of compensation shall be suspended or discontinued."

SEC. 6. That section 202, subdivision (1), paragraph (e), of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended (sec. 475, title 38, U. S. C.), be hereby amended to read as follows:

"(e) If he has a mother or father, either or both dependent on him for support, then, in addition to the above amounts, $10 for each parent so dependent: Provided, That the status of dependency shall be determined annually as of the anniversary date of the approval of the award, and the director is authorized to require the submission of such proof of dependency as he, in his discretion, deems necessary: Provided further, That upon refusal or neglect of the claimant to supply such proof of dependency in a reasonable time, the payment of such additional compensation as herein provided shall be suspended or discontinued."

SEC. 7. That the first paragraph of section 202, subdivision (7), of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended (sec. 480, title 38, U. S. C.), be hereby amended to read as follows:

"(7) Where any disabled person having neither wife, child, nor dependent parent, shall, after July 1, 1924, have been maintained by the Government of the United States for a period or periods amounting to six months in an institution or institutions, and shall be deemed by the director to be insane, the compensation for such person shall thereafter be $30 per month so long as he shall thereafter be maintained by the bureau in an institution; and such compensation may, in the discretion of the director, be paid to the chief officer of said institution to be used for the benefit of such person: Provided, however, That if such person shall recover his reason and shall be discharged from such institution as competent, such additional sum shall be paid him as would equal the total sum by which his compensation has been reduced through the provisions of this subdivision."

SEC. 8. That section 206 of the World War veterans act, 1924, as amended (sec. 495, title 38, U. S. C.), is hereby repealed.

SEC. 9. That section 209 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended (sec. 498, title 38, U. S. C.), is hereby repealed.

SEC. 10. That section 301, paragraphs 3 and 4, of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended (sec. 512, title 38, U. S. C.), be hereby amended to read as follows:

"In case where an insured whose yearly renewable term insurance has matured by reason of total permanent disability is found and declared to be no longer permanently and totally disabled, and where the insured is required under regulations to renew payment of premiums on said term insurance, and where this contingency is extended beyond the period during which said yearly renewable term insurance otherwise must be converted, there shall be given such insured an additional period of two years from the date on which he is required to renew payment of premiums in which to reinstate or convert said term insurance as hereinbefore provided: Provided, That where the time for conversion has been extended under the second paragraph of this section because of the mental condition or disappearance of the insured, there shall be allowed to the insured an additional period of two years from the date on which he recovers from his mental disability or reappears in which to convert.

"The insurance except as provided herein shall be payable in 240 equal monthly installments: Provided, That when the amount of an individual monthly payment is less than $5, such amount may in the discretion of the director be allowed to accumulate without interest and be disbursed annually. Provisions for maturity at certain ages, for continuous installments during the life of the insured or beneficiaries, or both, for refund of premiums, cash, loan, paid-up, and extended values, dividends from gains and savings, and such other provisions for the protection and advantage of and for alternative benefits to the insured and the beneficiaries as may be found to be reasonable and practicable, may be provided for in the contract of insurance, or from time to time by regulations. All calculations shall be based upon the American Experience Table of Mortality and interest at 3½ per cent per annum, except that no deduction shall be made for continuous installments during the life of the insured in case his total and permanent disability continues more than 240 months. Subject to regulations, the insured shall at all times have the right to change the beneficiary or beneficiaries without the consent of such beneficiary or beneficiaries, but only within the classes herein provided."

SEC. 11. That section 311 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended (title 38, U. S. C.), be hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 311. The director is hereby authorized and directed to include in United States Government life (converted) insurance policies provision whereby an insured, who is totally disabled as a result of disease or injury for a period of three consecutive months or more, before attaining the age of 65 years and before default in payment of any premium, shall be paid disability benefits at the rate of $5.75 monthly for each $1,000 of converted insurance in force when total-disability benefits become payable. The amount of such monthly payment under the provisions of this section shall not be reduced because of payment of permanent and total disability benefits under the United States Government life (converted) insurance policy. Such payments shall be effective as of the date of beginning of total disability, and shall be made monthly during the continuance of such total disability. Such payments shall be concurrent with or independent of permanent total-disability benefits under the United States Government life (converted) insurance policy. In addition to the monthly disability benefits the payment of premiums on the United States Government life (converted) insurance policy and for the total-disability benefits authorized by this section shall be waived during the continuance of such total disability. Regulations shall provide for reexaminations of beneficiaries under this section; and, in the event that it is found that an insured is no longer totally disabled, the waiver of premiums and payment of benefits shall cease and the United States Government life (converted) insurance policy, including the total-disability provision authorized by this section, may be continued by payment of premiums as provided in said policy and the total-disability provision authorized by this section. Neither the dividends nor the amount payable in any settlement under any United States Government life (converted) insurance policy shall be decreased because of disability benefits granted under the provisions of this section. The payment of total-disability benefits shall not prejudice the right of any insured, who is totally and permanently disabled, to total permanent disability benefits under his United States Government life (converted) insurance policy: Provided, That the provision authorized by this section shall not be included in any United States Government life (converted) insurance policy heretofore or hereafter issued except upon application, payment of premium by the insured, and proof of good health satisfactory to the director. The benefit granted under this section shall be on the basis of multiples of $500, and not less than $1,000 or more than the amount of United States Government life (converted) insurance in force at the time of application. The director shall determine the amount of the monthly premium to cover the benefits of this section, and in order to continue such benefits in force the monthly premiums shall be payable until the insured attains the age of 65 years or until the prior maturity of the policy. In all other respects such monthly premium shall be payable under the same terms and conditions as the regular monthly premium on the United States Government life (converted) insurance policy."

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, time is very limited for the discussion of this meaure, and it is very technical. In order that all this discussion concerning veterans' legislation and hospitalization may be found in one place and that the things that are said concerning this measure may be brought to the attention of the House, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting the report on this bill and the majority report and the minority views on the bill H. R. 15921, the hospitalization bill, which is found in report No. 2715. This will put in the RECORD the views of everybody.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I can not agree to see go into this RECORD the minority report on bills that the gentleman from South Dakota will not help us to get up on the floor of the House and pass, and I will have to object.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Will the gentleman reserve his objection for a moment?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes; I will do that.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Why will not the gentleman let everything that has been said by everybody who has discussed these measures go into the RECORD, so that every Member of the Congress and the public will not have to search 40 different RECORDS and reports to find out what has been said and what has been done. If the gentleman will consent to my request, it will put in the RECORD to-day the views of everyone on all veterans' legislation and save a great search of RECORDS and reading of reports.

Mr. RANKIN. I am not willing for that minority report to go into this RECORD without having an opportunity to answer it on the floor of this House, and I am going to stand by my objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Now, Mr. Speaker, in order that the membership of the House may in the future be able to find the conflicting viewpoints of Members of the House, I desire at this time to say that anyone who desires to be fully advised may refer to the RECORD of last Monday, February 25, when a bill reported by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], a general pension bill, was discussed in the House, and the debate will be found in the RECORD of the date to which I have referred. I desire further to call the attention of the House, in connection with the debate we have just had, to the fact that all the information concerning the hospital building bill (H. R. 15921) may be found in report No. 2715; and in that report will be found the majority report of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation and the minority views signed by myself and three other members of the committee.

Mr. GREEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. GREEN. I believe the chairman of the committee is advised that something like two years ago there was considerable talk by the bureau, if not by the committee, about consolidating hospitals in the Southeast and possibly the elimination of the hospital at Lake City, Fla., does the gentleman know of any move like that?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I would say to the gentleman I do not think there is any such move under way. I do not foresee the abandonment of any Veterans' Bureau hospital at this time.

Mr. GREEN. I appreciate that information.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Now, Mr. Chairman, in the short time allotted to me it is absolutely impossible to discuss in any great degree this technical measure. So I now ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point in my remarks the unanimous report of the World War Veterans' Committee on the bill now under consideration.

Mr. RANKIN. The bill now before the House?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Yes; the insurance bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RANKIN. That does not include the minority views on the other bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. No.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the report contains the bill itself. The bill has already been read and I suggest that the gentleman omit the bill which is at the conclusion of the report.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I shall omit that in my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota, from the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation, submitted the following report (to accompany H. R. 16819):

The Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 16819) to amend the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended, having considered the same, reports thereon with the recommendation that it be passed. The bill as now presented proposes several substantial changes to which the attention of the House of Representatives is specifically directed. They are as follows:

1. Section 1 of the bill amends section 16 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended, for the purpose of specifically authorizing the refund of premiums on war risk term insurance. The bureau since its inception has always, wherever a retroactive rating of permanent and total disability has been made as of a date prior to the time when the insured ceased the payment of premiums, refunded such premiums. This practice is in accord with the practice of all commercial insurance companies. However, in the Harvey Ned Howard case the Comptroller General (decisions of November 9, 1928, and January 7, 1929) stated that the appropriations for yearly renewable term insurance were not available for the refund of premiums. Your committee thought that the bureau's practice was in accord with the existing law but in order to overcome the decisions of the Comptroller General and to insure expedited action on the refund of such premiums the amendment is included in this bill.

2. Section 2 of the bill proposes to amend section 19 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended, which relates to the filing of suits on insurance, by including therein a provision authorizing the court as part of judgments entered thereunder to direct the refund of unearned premiums, and also by authorizing the issuance of subpœnas for witnesses who are required to attend the trials, these subpœnas to run from any district into another, provided that in the event the witness lives out of the district in which the court is held at a greater distance than 100 miles from the place the court is held, the permission of the court must be had. Prior to September 19, 1928, the district courts had authority to issue subpœnas under the circumstances mentioned, this authority being contained in section 654, title 28, United States Code, the operation of which, however, expired, by its own terms, on September 19, 1928, since which date the United States district courts have had no authority in civil cases to subpœna witnesses living in a different district a greater distance than 100 miles from the place in which the court is held. Defense witnesses in most of the insurance suits live more than 100 miles from the district court in which the suits are brought, and although authority exists for the taking of testimony of such witnesses by deposition, this method is unsatisfactory and the defense of the Government is restricted and hampered by the limitations of the present law. This amendment is recommneded by the director. The bill further proposes to amend section 19 by the inclusion of a paragraph under which the director will be authorized to order part-time and fee-basis employees of the bureau to appear as witnesses in suits against the Government under this section and to pay them, in his discretion, a fee in an amount not to exceed $20 per day. The Comptroller General has ruled that the Government is unauthorized to pay as expert witnesses in the trial of insurance suits physicians who are already in the employ of the Government on a part-time or fee basis, on the theory that the payment of a witness fee in addition to the usual compensation paid them as part-time salaries or as fees by the bureau would be double payment to these employees. This lack of authority in the bureau to use and pay as witnesses physicians who are familiar with the cases in suit also hampers the Government in its defense.

3. Section 3 of the bill proposes to amend section 28 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended, to provide that said section, as amended, shall be deemed to be in effect as of June 7, 1924. Section 28 of the World War veterans' act, as amended, authorizes the waiver of recovery of payments from any person, who, in the judgment of the director, is without fault on his part, and where, in the judgment of the director, such recovery would defeat the purpose of benefits otherwise authorized or would be against equity and good conscience, and further provides that no disbursing officer shall be held liable for any amount paid by him to any person where the recovery of such amount is waived under this section. The last-mentioned provision, relieving the disbursing officers from liability, was inserted in the statute at the first session of the present Congress on recommendation of the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau, it having been shown that the Comptroller General of the United States had held that, although recovery might be waived in so far as the payee was concerned, the disbursing officer was nevertheless liable under his bond for any erroneous disbursement. Although the committee believed that the language was sufficiently clear and unambiguous to express the intention of Congress, that these disbursing officers should no longer be liable for amounts, the recovery of which had been waived prior to the amendment, as well as those which might be waived subsequent thereto, the Comptroller General has ruled that there is no authority to apply this amendment retroactively so as to relieve disbursing officers for disallowances set up against their accounts prior to May 29, 1928. This amendment specifically declaring that section 28, as amended, shall be deemed to be in effect as of June 7, 1924, is therefore now included at the request of the director of the bureau. It is estimated that the cost of this amendment will be approximately $218,500.

4. Section 4 of the bill adds a new section to Title I of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended, to provide that checks properly issued to beneficiaries, which are undelivered for any reason, shall be retained in the files of the bureau until such time as delivery may be accomplished, or until three full fiscal years have elapsed after the end of the fiscal year in which issued. This amendment is included at the request of the director. At the present time the General Accounting Office insists that all undelivered checks, which are more than three months old, be forwarded to that office for safe-keeping, with the requirement that a claim be submitted by the payee before they may be remailed. This procedure was established under regulations issued by the Comptroller General under his general authority to regulate the settlement and adjustment of the accounts of the Government of the United States. It is not believed, however, that this procedure properly considers the great numbers of checks issued by the bureau and which, upon failure of delivery to beneficiaries, are returned. It is not thought that a beneficiary, who has once filed a proper claim for the benefits conferred by the legislation administered by the United States Veterans' Bureau, and who very often is receiving current payments on an award, should be required to file another claim in order to secure a check which has been issued to him and returned to the bureau undelivered for any reason. Further, the work of the bureau is complicated unduly, especially in the supervision of the accounts of fiduciaries for minor and incompetent beneficiaries, inasmuch as when these checks are remailed by the General Accounting Office the bureau receives no notice thereof, unless certification is made to a payee other than the one in whose favor the check was originally drawn, and it will readily be seen, therefore, that a fiduciary may receive payments of which the bureau will have no knowledge and will therefore be unable to require a proper accounting as contemplated by section 21 of the World War veterans' act, as amended. The amendment recommended whereby the Veterans' Bureau will be authorized to retain these checks for a period of not more than three years will be less costly, in the opinion of the bureau, than the present procedure under which they are required to be delivered to the General Accounting Office, to be held for a period of not less than three years before final disposal is made of them.

5. Section 5 of the bill proposes to amend section 201, subdivision (f) of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended, which now provides that the status of dependency of a father or mother of a deceased veteran who is receiving dependency compensation, shall be determined as of the first day of each year, by the substitution of language, which, although requiring an annual determination of dependency, will not require it as of the first day of each year, which has been construed by the bureau and the Comptroller General to mean the first day of each calendar year. The administrative burden placed upon the bureau through the necessity of reviewing all of these cases as of the 1st day of January in each year is so great that the director has recommended that the language be changed to permit of the annual review as of the anniversary date of the award. This will spread the reviews throughout the entire year, and not only relieve the burden upon the bureau but also upon the dependent parents, especially in those cases where the first award is made toward the end of one calendar year, only to be reviewed, with the submission of such proof as may be required, as of the first of the next calendar year.

6. Section 6 of the bill proposes to amend section 202, subdivision (1), paragraph (e) of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended, which provides for the payment of dependency compensation to parents of disabled veterans, by the substitution of the same language relative to the annual review of the status of dependency as is included in section 201 (f) and explained in paragraph 5 of this report with reference to parents of deceased veterans. The reasons for making this amendment are the same.

7. Section 7 of the bill proposes to amend the first paragraph of section 202, subdivision (7) of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended, by increasing the amount of compensation now paid to disabled veterans who have no dependents and who are being maintained by the Government in hospitals, from $20 to $30 per month. This amendment would result in an increased cost to the Government of $643,980 per annum.

8. Sections 8 and 9 of the bill propose to repeal sections 206 and 209 of the statute which now limit the time for filing claim and proof thereof to April 6, 1930. There would be no immediate increased cost involved in this amendment in view of the fact that the termination date will not be reached until April 6, 1930. It is impossible to estimate the effect of the repeal of these sections prior to that date. It is the opinion of the committee that no restrictions should be placed upon the filing of claims and proof thereof.

9. Section 10 of the bill proposes a slight amendment to paragraph 3 of section 301 of the statute. This section now provides that where an insured, whose yearly renewable term insurance has matured by reason of permanent and total disability, is found and declared to be no longer totally disabled, and is required to renew payment of premiums on said term insurance, and this contingency is extended beyond the period during which said yearly renewable term insurance otherwise must be converted, there shall be given an additional period of two years in which to renew payment of premiums and to convert said term insurance. The amendment provides that during the same two years he shall also have the right to reinstate his term insurance should it lapse. There are quite a number of cases in which the insured has permitted his insurance to lapse either by failure to pay the first premium at the required time, or, having once renewed the payment of premiums, and before conversion, has permitted the insurance to lapse. In such cases the insured, unless in a state of health which would meet the requirements for direct application for converted insurance under section 310 of the World War veterans' act, as amended, is precluded from carrying Government insurance. This amendment would, within the 2-year period described, permit him to reinstate his old-term insurance and convert it under less rigid requirements as to good health.

The records of the bureau show that there are at present 100 cases in which insurance has been allowed to lapse after recovery from a disability rated permanent and total, 48 of which lapsed for the nonpayment of the first premium due after the rerating, and 52 for the nonpayment of premiums subsequent to the first. In a number of cases the remittance to cover the monthly premium was only a few days late. The fourth paragraph of this section is also amended, the purpose being merely to carry through the entire act the amendment included in section 1 of this bill which, as explained heretofore, amends section 16 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended, to specifically authorize refund of unearned premiums on yearly renewable term insurance.

10. Section 11 of the bill proposes to amend section 311 of the statute, which was added to the law at the last session of Congress (Public, No. 585, 70th Cong.), and was designed to authorize the director to include in the present United States Government life (converted) insurance policy a clause providing a new maturing factor. This amendment provided that where an insured was totally disabled for a period of 12 consecutive months he should receive disability benefits as though he were permanently and totally disabled, thus authorizing the payment of disability benefits of $5.75 for each $1,000 of insurance, the face of the policy being depleted by such payments. Prior to this amendment the man must have been permanently and totally disabled before any disability benefit was payable under his policy. The amendment in the present bill, however, provides for a disability benefit of $5.75 per $1,000 upon application of the insured, which upon the happening of the contingency on which it is based, i. e., total disability for a period of three months or more, shall be paid independent of the present permanent and total disability clause in the policy and shall not deplete the face value of the policy. In the event the insured becomes actually permanently and totally disabled within the meaning of the present provision in the converted insurance policy he is, under the amendment, to receive payments under the new total disability clause concurrently with payments under the permanent and total disability clause now in the converted policy, payments under the latter only depleting the face value. This new disability feature is limited to a rate of $5.75 on each $1,000 of insurance carried and may be less than the total amount carried but not more. It is to be handled as a separate liability from the present provision for a permanent and total disability and will be so shown on the records, so that the present United States Government life-insurance fund shall not be assessed for any losses to be paid under this provision. This insurance will be paid for by the insured and will not result in any increased cost to the Government except in so far as the cost of administration is concerned.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, this measure would cost the Government approximately $900,000 per year. It is a unanimous report of the committee, and the bill contains no provision that was not unanimously reported from the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation during the last session of this Congress and was not unanimously passed by this House at the last session of this Congress.

It was the intention of the committee to present a bill to this House, and, therefore, to the Congress, that could be enacted. There were many matters that perhaps a majority of the committee would like to have included in this measure, but at this short session in a parliamentary body not so far away from here it might meet with opposition and be defeated if it contained controversial matters.

One of the most important provisions in the bill is the change in the insurance features of the World War veterans' act which will allow service men by the payment of a slight additional premium to secure a rider on their insurance policies not at the Government expense but at their own expense, which will give them in the future for total disability, $57.50 monthly for life, making to these men who carry insurance a total payment of $115 per month. The $57.50 additional will not be deducted from the face of the policy as is now done under the total disability act.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, this is a legislative bill, and its provisions are primarily for the benefit of the disabled men. I have not the time to speak of all of the provisions of the bill, but again I wish to call to your attention the fact that this bill carries a provision to remove the limitation as to the time of filing the claim for those who were disabled in the service.

The bill last year had it, and the Senate struck it out. There is no reason why a man who is disabled or injured in the service should not at any time file his claim for compensation. There should be no limit on that.

Another provision in the bill which would take quite a time to explain is that provided for the benefit of those who are carrying insurance. The bill, on the whole, is largely for the administrative purposes of the bureau.

While others have spoken of the hospital bill, I desire to call the attention of Members of the House to a condition which will have to be met in the future by Congress. We are constructing hospitals in many States in the United States for the benefit of the disabled men. The load of the insane or mental cases is increasing, and the experts say that in the next 20 years the Government will have 45,000 to 50,000 of these cases. Realize, now, that the Federal Government has no right to control the custody of any citizen of the United States, whether that citizen be sane or be mentally ill. As an illustration, North Carolina has no hospital for those mentally ill. North Carolina's patients have to be sent to Perry Point, Md., Augusta, Ga., or to Gulfport, Miss. No court in North Carolina, or in any other State, for that matter, can adjudge a man who is insane to be confined out of the State in an institution. A man can go to the Gulfport Hospital, but when he gets there—in a moment of sanity, it may be—he says that he wants to be turned loose, and they have to turn him loose, and he goes home.

This is one of the conditions that will have to be met in the future, for it is causing the bureau trouble now. I believe that every man who is in the service, who is disabled by that service, should receive the full benefit of the law; if possible, he should receive more than the benefit, if you please, from this Government; but there should not be any wild method of arriving at what should be the best for him.

There are bills which have been introduced, which will place every man who is disabled regardless of his disability under the provisions of the World War veterans' act, and speaking as an ex-service man I can not approve of those bills, one of which, I think, has been reported, which would allow any man who was disabled in the World War, from any cause whatever, to receive the benefits of the World War veterans' act. Speaking as an ex-service man myself, if I had been injured in the service the Government should deal very kindly and sympathetically with me, but the Government does not owe me one cent because I served it in time of national peril.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Does the gentleman from North Carolina understand the present law to be that veterans who are suffering with diseases that are of nonservice origin can only be hospitalized when there are beds not needed by soldiers who are suffering from service-connected cases?

Mr. BULWINKLE. That is hardly correct.

Mr. DENISON. Then, is the law being disregarded when the hospitals are filled up by service men who are suffering with diseases of nonservice origin, when there are other veterans who are entitled to be hospitalized?

Mr. BULWINKLE. It is, yes; if that is being done.

Mr. DENISON. What can we do about that, what ought we to do about that?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I agree with the lady from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS] that there should be a careful investigation of this subject, and sufficient beds should be provided to take care of the Government beneficiaries. But remember this, that in the tuberculous cases the load is decreasing each year, and in the surgical cases, I think, it is slightly increasing.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. As a matter of fact, in determining who enters the hospitals when they are crowded for room, the bureau goes into the financial condition of the applicant, does it not?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I do not think so; I never heard of that being done.

Mr. MICHENER. I had a letter from a service man the other day who said that they asked him to fill out what he called a "pauper affidavit," and I took up the matter with the department and sent them the letter, and their reply was that they had to make proper regulations and make certain inquiries, and the substance of the reply was that when there was one man who could afford to pay for his own treatment, then the other man who could not so afford was given preference, or something to that effect.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Possibly that is so, but I have never had that to contend with. I would suggest that you talk to General Hines. He, I might say, is doing his utmost for the disabled.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON. I would like to get the gentleman's opinion on the question of limiting the percentage of non-service-connected cases so as to keep beds always available for service-origin cases.

Mr. BULWINKLE. You never will have beds available unless the number of hospitals and the number of beds are increased. We have taken in the Spanish-American War veterans, all the World War veterans, all veterans of the Philippine insurrection, and others, and it should be remembered that each day these men are growing older, and that diseases are increasing among them to a certain extent. I would not want to say that I would be in favor of limiting any number that could be taken under any bill.

Mr. NEWTON. The way we are now proceeding, even if we should make a substantial increase in the number of hospitals, and thereby increase the beds, in a short space of time they would be filled up by nonservice patients. Am I not correct in that?

Mr. BULWINKLE. That is correct.

Mr. NEWTON. Will we not be faced with that situation, and is there any way out of it other than the multiplying of hospitals to a great extent or limiting the number of nonservice patients?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I would not limit them at the present time, but, as the lady from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS] said, you will have to have a study of this question. All on the committee agree practically on the question of hospitalization. I know there is not a single man who opposes increased hospital facilities.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. As I understand the gentleman, he states that the peak in the tuberculosis cases has been reached?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. And that the peak in the surgical cases is almost reached?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. In regard to the nervous or mental disease cases, is it not true that that peak has not been arrived at?

Mr. BULWINKLE. There will be within the next 20 years 30,000 more men than there are now. There are now around 15,000, in round numbers, and there will be around 45,000 to be taken care of 20 years from now.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. As a matter of fact, do not the authorities state that the peak in the N. P. cases will not be reached until 1947?

Mr. BULWINKLE. That is correct.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am very much interested in the statement of the gentleman from North Carolina and also in the statement of the lady from Massachusetts. The lady from Massachusetts referred to a bill which I understood is pending that will create a board to make an investigation of this entire subject. I want to know why your committee could not make that investigation, why it could not summon the officers of the Veterans' Bureau before it, why, through correspondence with Legion posts and representatives of the Legion, it could not make an investigation, because, if a board is created, it means that it must go over for another year?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Are you going to take over the soldiers' homes? If you do, you will add additional facilities. That is to be considered. You have the Public Health Service hospitals. All these institutions should be considered in the entire question of hospitalization.

Mr. HASTINGS. Ought not a committee of Congress consider it rather than a board?

Mr. BULWINKLE. A committee of Congress would be satisfactory, but probably what the lady from Massachusetts has in mind is a board appointed by members of these various committees affecting this matter to consider it.

Mr. HASTINGS. I favor the committee considering it itself, without passing the responsibility on to any board, because, after all, the committee will have to come back and review the findings of the board.

Mrs. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, my feeling was that it would be much better to have a nonpartisan board, a board composed of men who were not paid for that investigation. Then you would have, in my opinion, a little fairer report and a report that the country would consider a little bit more unprejudiced.

Mr. HASTINGS. I thought that this committee was a nonpartisan committee.

Mr. BULWINKLE. It is absolutely a nonpartisan committee. I have never seen yet, since I have been on the committee, a single bit of partisanship manifested. Of course, the members of the committee differ on various questions, but not from a partisan standpoint.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I want to know if this is a slow program, a continuation of hospital building as the ex-service men need hospitals?

Mr. BULWINKLE. The program up to this date is just what was thought to be needed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I know; but I need hospitals for 150 men who are insane and I can not get them.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I regret that time does not permit me to answer the questions and further explain this and the hospital bill. I must close, but before I do I wish to express my appreciation of the many kindnesses and the many courtesies and the sterling qualities of each and every member on the committee.

Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, how much time remains on each side?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE] has 6 minutes and the gentleman from South Dakota has 13.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, this is the last time the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE], who has just addressed the House, will appear in this body for some time as a Member of Congress, and I do not want to close this discussion on veterans' legislation without expressing to him some of the feeling that the majority side of the House entertains for him. His work on the committee has been rendered without partisanship. He has rendered in the House and in committee the same service that he rendered to his Government as a major of artillery in a combat unit during the World War. [Applause.] No propaganda from any source has been able to swerve him from his path of duty, any more than the enemy artillery could drive him from the battle field in the World War. [Applause.]

Members of the House may not know it, but so far as I know—and I think I am correct—he is the only man of the minority party who was ever appointed by a chairman of the opposite political faith to act as chairman of a subcommittee. I had the pleasure of appointing him as the chairman of a subcommittee to survey and inspect the hospitals in the South, and he discovered many things in the hospitals of North Carolina and neighboring States which were of great value to the committee, to the service men, and the country. When he leaves here I know I am expressing the feeling of the entire House when I say the House realizes that it is losing a man of great moral courage and of high ideals whose presence from the House will be greatly missed. [Applause.]

I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to have the opportunity to add a word to what the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] has said in regard to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE]. The gentleman from North Carolina has been a courageous, consistent, and faithful public servant. [Applause.]

In the matter of the pending bill it is only fair to call attention to the fact that the action of the committee is unanimous. The support of it includes that of every man on the committee who has been charged in some quarters with being disloyal to the interests of the veterans. Such unanimous support has been the case with nearly all the general legislation that has been reported in behalf of World War veterans since the committee was created.

In that period its advice has prevailed in the matter of three hospital bills, resulting in the total appropriation of $31,850,000 for new construction. With the other members of the committee I have shared the responsibility for this, approving and urging all save $2,000,000 last year added to the bill that as chairman of the subcommittee on hospitals I had reported to the full committee. My reason for opposing that addition was one I would bring to your attention because of its bearing on this whole matter of hospitals, namely, lack of knowledge on which to act. This is also a fundamental reason why there bids fair to be no action this year. It lies in the fact that we have been unable to verify the allegations made that there are veterans of the World War suffering from ailments or injuries incurred therein who can not be hospitalized. Again and again I have asked for that information, and I ask for it to-day. I request that so much as one name, with address, be submitted. My colleague tells you that there are hundreds of such cases, but not a name has been brought to our committee.

Mrs. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. LUCE. I do so, with great pleasure.

Mrs. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the names of men who are awaiting hospitalization who are service connected. [Applause.]

Mr. LUCE. I thank the lady. I have been hunting for this information and have been assured again and again that it would be given to me, but never has the name with address of one such case been presented. If names with addresses are now presented I shall be grateful. I have sought such names in order to verify the allegations. If such names are given they will be sent to the Veterans' Bureau and if the facts are as represented we will demand the reasons why these men are not in hospitals. Under the law they should be hospitalized. The Veterans' Bureau time and time again has denied that there are such cases. I do not want to act upon rumors and gossip. I want to rely on facts. There may be those in this House who do not want facts and are willing to grant every request made to them in behalf of the veteran without consideration of details. As a member of the committee and as a Member of the House I want to know the facts that a just and wise answer may be given when requests for legislation are made.

The suggestion of my colleague the lady from Massachusetts that a thorough study be made of the whole hospital situation, meets my hearty approval. Also I approve her suggestion that there should be inquiry as to the possibility of some plan whereunder the various States should pay for the non-service-connected cases in Federal hospitals. The need for knowledge confirms my belief that we act prudently this year in not authorizing further appropriation now. Within a month Congress has appropriated $8,000,000 for new construction and $3,250,000 for extensions, alterations, and so forth, making a total of $11,250,000 available for construction purposes in the coming fiscal year. The Veterans' Bureau informs us that this is as much as it can wisely expend in the 12 months onward from the 1st of July next. There will be ample time next winter to provide what should be expended after July 1, 1930. The inquiry and study my colleague suggests to be desirable would let us then act with understanding of the need such as human foresight is now unequal to giving.

Mrs. NORTON of New Jersey. Will the gentleman please tell the Members of the House why he introduced this bill?

Mr. LUCE. I introduced the hospital bill at the request of the American Legion. I believe in the purposes of the American Legion. I desire to help the American Legion, and when I am asked as a matter of courtesy to introduce a bill it submits, I gladly grant its request. Does the lady think I am to be criticized for granting that courtesy to the American Legion?

Mrs. NORTON of New Jersey. I think one should be criticized for introducing a bill and then not supporting the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. May I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the American Legion, the Disabled American Veterans, and the Veterans of Foreign Wars—the three recognized organizations—submit bills to the chairman of the committee for introduction and the chairman introduces such bills for the benefit of the membership of the House, but that does not mean that the chairman supports everything contained in those bills.

Mr. NEWTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Certainly.

Mr. NEWTON. I want to add to what has been said that it is the practice of the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and of the chairmen of subcommittees of that committee to repeatedly introduce bills at the request of others for the purpose of bringing the subject matter before the House for careful consideration and deliberation. I have done it. It is likewise the practice in other committees. It does not commit one to the bill or even its general principle.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I would make an earnest appeal to Members to read the report to which reference has been made, and, lest you may not have secured the number of the report, I give it again, Report No. 2715, accompanying H. R. 15921. You will find in the minority views no argument, but you will find a statement of facts that vitally concern directly, individually, and personally every Member of this House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman one additional minute.

Mr. LUCE. The proposals therein explained vitally concern the fortunes of every man here; they concern the affairs of the Republic more than any other proposals that have been brought in since the World War; in their ultimate results they involve billions of expenditure. I ask you simply to study the facts. You will have to answer the questions raised. They are here. They must be faced. You should be ready to answer [Applause.]

Under permission to extend my remarks, I would add a condensation of the "views" to which reference has been made. These views are held by the chairman of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation, Hon. ROYAL C. JOHNSON, of South Dakota, Hon. RANDOLPH PERKINS and Hon. FREDERICK R. LEHLBACH, of New Jersey, and myself. The full statement should be read by anyone who would share in contributing to that public opinion without adequate expression of which no decision on such all-important issues should be reached.

The issues in question are those of pensions and State medicine for between four and five million of our people. They involve ultimate outlay of a huge amount through the medium of taxes and appropriations.

They were raised by two bills reported on the same day from the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation. One would have given virtually a pension of $100 a month to every veteran totally disabled by a chronic or constitutional disease, regardless of its origin, thus bringing in men suffering from ailments incurred or injuries sustained since the World War, whether or not the result of accident or their own misconduct. This would be the first step toward pensions to all afflicted veterans. In the case of those hospitalized it would be on top of $120 a month of hospital expense borne by the Federal Government, making a total grant of $220 a month.

As the maxim says, "It is the first step that costs."

The chairman of the committee, in his minority report, pointed out that such legislation, carried to its logical conclusion, would shortly require the expenditure of billions of dollars of the public funds. If the laws are to be so amended, we must immediately face the problem of greatly increasing the public revenue. It is manifestly unfair, unjust, and inequitable, said Mr. JOHNSON, to prefer one sole class of non-service-connected disability cases and pay this class $100 per month pension plus hospitalization.

The other measure reported, the hospital construction bill, was the response to the first definite expression of intent on the part of the Veterans' Bureau to build new hospitals in order to serve non-service-connected cases, a course not now warranted by law. Hitherto the new construction has all been to meet the needs of those suffering by reason of the war. This would bring in those suffering by reason of the hazards of life since the war.

It was pointed out that the original outlay is but the beginning of expenses. The maintenance cost averages $4 a day, or $1,460 a year for every occupied bed. For hospitals of medium size, 250 beds, this means $365,000 a year of running expense. If the hospital should be used for 40 years, the total would be $14,600,000 in addition to original cost of not less than $1,100,- 000, and there should be added for replacements and repairs enough to make the grand total at least $16,000,000.

This means that every bed supplied implies an ultimate expenditure of $64,000.

The total of more than $200,000,000 involved in the particular program urged for authorization this year was brought to attention, not because it is beyond the capacity of the Nation, nor because it should be escaped if duty demands otherwise, but to bring out the seriousness of action by the committees of Congress and by Congress itself.

The House was informed that on the 1st of last December the Veterans' Bureau was hospitalizing 10,160 cases not shown to be connected with the World War, more than one-third of all those being hospitalized. They were costing the Federal Government, at $4 a day for average maintenance cost, $40,640 a day, which is at the rate of very nearly $15,000,000 a year.

In these enlightened days, it was declared, the common instincts of humanity demand that all suffering men and women who can not afford private treatment shall get hospital care.

We do not so much as whisper a word against this outlay—

Said the report—

we raise only the question, Who shall bear the cost? Ought it to be borne by the Nation, or by the States, counties, cities, towns, or neighborhoods concerned? These men and women once wore the khaki. Does this of itself put on the Federal Government the responsibility of caring for their ailments or injuries? Or when those ailments or injuries are the result of the hazards incident to civil life, as distinct from military service, is the responsibility instead that of civil organization of the vicinity, governmental, or otherwise? We are not disposed here to try to answer the question. What we urge, and the only thing we urge, is that it should be answered and forthwith.

The "views" referred to went on to say that the present situation is wholly illogical and unfair, for the reason that it is distributing the burden unequally. To illustrate, the district made up of Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin is hospitalizing at Federal expense about three times more in proportion to population than is the district made up of Ohio, Indiana, and Kentucky; that made up of Louisiana, Alabama, and Mississippi about twice as many as that made up of Pennsylvania and Delaware. There is good reason to believe, though it can not be proved by figures, that the cities are getting much more than their fair share of Federal aid in this way, with injustice to the remoter country regions. To illustrate, in the Edward Hines Junior Hospital, in Chicago, December 1 last, there were 293 victims of the war, and 558 cases that could not be shown to be connected with the war. The maintenance cost for these 558 nonservice-connected cases is at the rate of more than $800,000 a year.

If these 558 men and women, not suffering because of military service, should nevertheless be cared for at Federal expense, if the more than 10,000 such cases in the whole country now hospitalized should so be cared for, then why not every other suffering man and woman in the land ever in the Army or Navy be treated in the same way?

If so, then at any rate the cost in prospect should at least be estimated and faced. What will it cost to hospitalize at Federal expense between four and five million men and women whenever it may be needed as long as life may last?

The instant need would be to build about 200 more hospitals, at a cost of perhaps $150,000,000. Many more would be necessary if attention were to be paid to propinquity; that is, to putting a hospital within easy reach of every sufferer.

As to the maintenance costs of these hospitals and the additional expense contemplated by the program urged, only a guess is possible, but if you put at a million, the figure of those who will turn to Federal hospitals for medical, surgical, ocular, aural, dental, and other treatment (for in principle there is no limiting the nature of the demand), and if you put the total cost through life at $1,000 each, covering the needs of, say, 40 years on the average, you would have a thousand million dollars as the total.

This estimate would be far below the probabilities, for the proposal is to give free treatment to every applicant who can reach the door of a hospital, regardless of his ability to pay. In the light of the well-known phase of human nature, it can be safely predicted that many more than from one-fifth to one-quarter of the veterans of the World War will turn from private practitioners to the Federal physicians, surgeons, oculists, aurists, and dentists when their services can be had without charge. Furthermore, the Federal practitioners, supported by the taxpayers, will not be the only resort. To-day the inmates of the hospitals get when necessary the help of the best specialists within reach. It may be confidently predicted that like help will be put at the command of those who come to the doors of the hospital.

The program may not stop there. The records of the bureau show that last year the out-patient medical service reported 38,633 home visits. Where is this to end logically save in home visits to every ailing veteran?

The strong protest of the American Medical Association may be prompted by self-interest. Its merit is not to be here weighed. "We wish" it was said, "simply to call attention to the existing fact, and to its logical conclusion."

Under the law the Director of the Bureau is required to hospitalize every service-connected case, in the State or civil hospitals when there are not available beds in Federal hospitals. The suggestion that this can not be done because of lack of room in State and civil hospitals is hard to reconcile with the fact that in 1922, when the peak was reached, 47,962 veterans were in State or civil hospitals, whereas in 1928 the number had been reduced to 2,416.

It is inconceivable that only six years ago there were almost 48,000 beds available in State and civil hospitals, but that there are none now. As a matter of fact the continued presence of 2,416 veterans in State and civil hospitals is in part due to the opposition to transfer made by guardians, and to the preferences of patients or their relatives.

Furthermore, while the supply of beds in Federal hospitals has been steadily increasing, the demand for them to accommodate service-connected cases has, with equal steadiness, been decreasing. From 21,899 such cases hospitalized in Veterans' Bureau hospitals or outside under contract December 31, 1925, the number fell to 16,253 at the end of September last. That is to say, in less than three years the demand fell by one-quarter. The general medical and surgical cases fell off by a third; the tuberculosis cases by more than one-half; only the neuropsychiatric increased. The rate of increase of the neuropsychiatric cases was 327 a year, at which rate the building of one medium hospital a year would suffice in case need could not be met by altering facilities no longer necessary for other types of disease.

All this shows that the real reason and the only reason for such further hospital construction programs as that submitted by the committee is to hospitalize veterans not shown to be suffering from ailments or injuries connected with the war.

Passage of the hospital bill would have committed the House to the policy of State medicine for four or five million of our people. This most far-reaching committal would have been made without adequate consideration by the House itself, without the benefit of any discussion of the issue in the press, without the knowledge of the people of the land. If it were wise thus to commit the Nation to a policy that would ultimately mean the expenditure of a billion dollars or more, surely that ought not to be done without the support of public opinion and the knowledge of the Congress making the commitment.

So we come face to face with these tremendously important issues. They must be met.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, how much time is remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Dakota has four minutes remaining and the gentleman from Mississippi six minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY].

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to take one of these minutes to pay my tribute to the ranking Democratic member of the Veterans' Committee, Major BULWINKLE, who is about to retire from Congress at this time. I wish to say to the membership of the House of Representatives that the service men of the United States, and particularly the disabled service men of the United States, had no better friend in the Congress of the United States than the gentleman from North Carolina, Major BULWINKLE. [Applause.]

Now, in the short time remaining to me, I wish to say simply this: For the third time on the floor of the House of Representatives at the close of a Congress I wish to protest against veterans' legislation being brought in under suspension of the rules. It seems that the powers that be are afraid to trust the membership of the House and afraid to give the membership of this body an opportunity to put any amendments on a bill affecting the World War veterans. The right is given to every other committee in the House, but the leaders are afraid to let the Congress go on record in doing justice to the service men. At this time I protest against it. Let me say again to the service men of the country that the administration has double-crossed them, and it will continue to do so until legislation is brought on the floor here which will allow the opportunity for amendments to be offered so that Congress and not the Republican leaders will be legislating for the disabled service men of the United States. So, I am again uttering my protest. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. VINCENT]. [Applause.]

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, a very large part of the discussion on this bill has been in connection with other matters and not at all connected with the present measure that is before the House for consideration. I hope the membership of the House will not be confused by that as to the question upon which they are now to decide—the passage of this particular measure.

May I say that this measure was prepared by a subcommittee consisting of the chairman of our main committee [Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota], the gentleman from North Carolina, Major BULWINKLE, and myself. It secured the unanimous approval of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation. It ought to be passed without a dissenting vote, in my humble judgment.

It has the support of the Veterans' Bureau with respect to every section of it. It will be of great benefit to the ex-service men. I have not time in three minutes to explain all of this. One thing it does is to repeal the time limit under which service men may make a claim for compensation. So long as they have to prove service-connected disability in order to get a compensation claim allowed, certainly the man who has waited and has taken his part in society ought not to be penalized and prevented from introducing his claim for consideration by the bureau by any time limit at all. [Applause.]

Another thing it does is this: The disabled man who has Government insurance can not obtain the benefit of the total and permanent disability provision under our present insurance policies until the physicians of the bureau have found that he is permanently and totally disabled so that there can never be any question of any recovery. This is not the rule with respect to policies in private insurance corporations. They provide, most of them, for three months' total disability; some provide for six months' total disability to bring into being the total-disability benefits.

This bill provides a sane, sensible way by which the veteran can obtain the benefit of total and permanent disability after a short time of actually proved total disability.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I now yield the one minute I have remaining to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], himself a distinguished soldier, to introduce a congressional medal of honor man and a very famous soldier of the World War who is now in the gallery.

A DISTINGUISHED VISITOR

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House. It seems eminently fitting at this time, while we are discussing legislation for the benefit of disabled veterans, to introduce to the House one of the outstanding heroes of the World War, Lieut. Dan Edwards, of New York City, who won the distinguished service cross with the First Division at Cantigny, and who later won the medal of honor at the battle of Soissons. Lieutenant Edwards lost an arm and a leg in the World War. I ask him now to stand up and be introduced to the Members of the House of Representatives. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I only wish there could be present in the gallery with Dan Edwards the youngest congressional medal of honor man, Dick O'Niel, who will be leading one of the organizations in the Inaugural Parade. I hope to have the pleasure of introducing that boy to the Members of the House before the expiration of the session.

WORLD WAR VETERANS' LEGISLATION

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, we are all for this bill. Our only objection is that it does not go far enough.

I object to the gentleman from South Dakota stating to the House and to the country, or to anybody else, that the bill which I introduced to take care of our disabled ex-service men who are totally and permanently disabled is a "general pension bill." His statement on the floor of the House the other day that it would pay some men $220 a month is so absurd, far afield, that I hardly think it is necessary to answer it.

But we have a few men who are not covered by this bill. We have a few men who evidently received their disabilities originally in the World War, who are now totally and permanently disabled, but who can not get a dollar in the world, and it is to take care of these men that I introduced this bill.

I want also to answer the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE], who is attacking the hospital bill. The gentleman says he introduced it, but he did it at the instance of the American Legion. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts think, or does the House think, that the American Legion or the Disabled American Veterans or any other veterans' organization would mislead the chairman of the subcommittee into introducing such a bill?

Not only this, but after an investigation the Veterans' Bureau came in and not only approved that bill but added $1,480,000 to it. This hospital bill, which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] and the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] are opposing, was considered by the World War Veterans' Committee and reported by a vote of almost 4 to 1. That bill is meritorious; the hospitals are needed and should be provided for at once.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the pending bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I was unable to get any time from Mr. JOHNSON, the gentleman in charge of H. R. 15921, the hospitalization bill. I am very much interested in this measure, and I feel that that is one proposition in which the Government should go out of its way to take care of World War soldiers. They made the great sacrifice and came back to us, a great many of them, in a condition for which no amount of money would repay them, and we certainly should use every effort to, as far as possible, take care of them in the best possible way, and give them the very best opportunity to recover as far as it is possible for them to do so.

Now, this statement with reference to having plenty of hospitals that has been made on the floor of this House. The facts will not substantiate it, for I have in my office now a number of cases where soldiers are waiting for hospitalization. They are emergency cases, and they should be hospitalized at the earliest possible date. In fact, any delay is very dangerous for them. Take, for instance, this case. A man with a blood pressure of 250. That is a dangerous condition for him to be in, and unless he gets medical treatment, at least at an early date, he is liable to die at any time. I know of such cases as that. I know of cases where men have lost their minds and they have to be kept at home for a week, 10 days, 2 weeks, and sometimes longer, before they can get in a Government hospital. This condition should not exist, and I sincerely hope that the committee having this matter in charge will use every effort to take care of these unfortunate people. In addition to that, there are a lot of the laws that are now controlling the compensation to soldiers that should be amended.

I have offered myself two bills which are meritorious, and should, by all means, be passed at the earliest possible date. It is true I introduced those bills late in the session, but early enough, so they could have been passed, if I could have gotten a report from the committee on them. One of them is H. R. 16765. This bill would amend section 200 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, by striking out January 1, 1925, wherever it appears in such section, and inserting in lieu thereof January 1, 1930. I think the present pension law would allow these soldiers a pension but it is not so construed by the Veterans' Bureau and they are turning down day after day deserving cases. This would let in a lot of cases that they could not possibly turn down, and it would compel them to do, in my opinion, what I think the law already sets up for them to do, but which under the construction of this act they fail to do, thereby doing these soldiers a great injustice.

Now, in addition to this bill, I have introduced another bill amending section 202, paragraph 7, of the Word War veterans' act of 1924, so as to amend by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph, to read as follows:

> That statements of competent physicians diagnosing disability act of tuberculosis should be accepted as sound proof in the absence of sputum or X-ray examinations.

Now, these cases run back as far as 1918, and unless these sputum or X-ray examinations are furnished these cases are turned down. At that time there were no X-ray examinations for those purposes, and therefore it was impossible for the soldier to have an examination which would cover that. Now, in my opinion, the Veterans' Bureau should not be so technical in cases where they can not help, but know where a man has been gassed and shell shocked that the disability that he now has should be traced to that. I have one particular case where a man was examined and treated for bronchial trouble and disease of his lungs by one of the most competent physicians in the city of Huntington. This case was turned down by the United States Veterans' Bureau at Charleston. It was then appealed to New York and was turned down there, and was argued by the board at Washington and all the evidence was presented in that case that anyone could possibly ask for, and then it was turned down. I was present and I knew that it was going to be turned down. I could feel that the board had already made up their minds before they heard a word of that evidence, and I want to repeat now my statement that I made to that board, and that was that the board did not realize or know what their duties were. They seemed to be of the opinion from their actions that it was their duty to, by some technicality, prevent the soldier from getting what he was justly entitled to. I told them that was not their duty; that their duty was to try this case the same as a judge on the bench, and if there were leanings at all, they should be in the interest of the soldier, because the Government was able to take care of itself. But that is not the way those cases are decided, and that is my reason for offering these amendments, so that the soldier can get what I feel he is justly entitled to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is, Shall the rules be suspended and the bill passed as amended?

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

REDUCTION OF INTEREST RATES ON ADJUSTED COMPENSATION LOANS

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 16395) to reduce interest rates on adjusted compensation loans.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the committee amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That subdivision (i) of section 502 of the World War adjusted compensation act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"'(i) The Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau is authorized, through such officers and at such regional offices, suboffices, and hospitals of the United States Veterans' Bureau as he may designate, and out of the United States Government life insurance fund established by section 17 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended, to make loans to veterans upon their adjusted-service certificates in the same amounts and upon the same terms and conditions as are applicable in the case of loans made under this section by a bank, and the provisions of this section shall be applicable to such loans; except that the rate of interest shall be 2 per cent per annum more than the rate charged at the date of the loan for the discount of 90-day commercial paper under section 13 of the Federal reserve act by the Federal reserve bank for the Federal reserve district in which is located the regional office, suboffice, or hospital of the United States Veterans' Bureau at which the loan is made, but in no event shall the rate of interest exceed 6 per cent per annum.'

"SEC. 2. Section 705 of the World War adjusted compensation act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 705. Whenever it appears to the director, by evidence clear and satisfactory to him, that any adjusted-service certificate has, without bad faith upon the part of the person entitled to payment thereon, been lost or destroyed, and such adjusted-service certificate is identified number and description, he shall, under such regulations and with such restrictions as to time and retention for security or otherwise as he may prescribe, issue a duplicate thereof of like value in all respects to the original certificate and so marked as to show the original number of the certificate lost or destroyed and the date thereof. The lawful holder of such certificate who makes application for a duplicate shall file in the United States Veterans' Bureau a bond in a penal sum of the face value of such lost or destroyed certificate, with two good and sufficient sureties, residents of the United States, to be approved by the director, with condition to indemnify and save harmless the United States from any claim upon such lost or destroyed certificate; except that a duplicate certificate shall be issued without the requirement of a bond when it is shown to the satisfaction of the director that the original certificate, (1) before delivery to the veteran, has been lost, destroyed, wholly or in part, or so defaced as to impair its value, and (2) after delivery to the veteran, has, without bad faith upon the part of the person entitled to payment thereon, been partially destroyed or defaced so as to impair its value, is capable of identification, and is surrendered by such person to the Veterans' Bureau.'"

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to amend the World War adjusted compensation act, as amended, by reducing the rates of interest on loans made by the Veterans' Bureau upon the security of adjusted-service certificates, and for other purposes."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended.

A motion by Mr. HAWLEY to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Interior Department appropriation bill, H. R. 15089, and further insist on the disagreement to the Senate amendment, and agree to the conference asked for

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Interior Department appropriation bill, further insist on the disagreement to the Senate amendment, and agree to the conference asked for. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I presume this is satisfactory to the minority Member?

Mr. CRAMTON. It certainly is.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Chair appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. CRAMTON, Mr. MURPHY, and Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado.

SURVEY FOR A NICARAGUAN CANAL

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Rules Committee, I call up a privileged House resolution.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 345

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 117, authorizing an investigation and survey for a Nicaraguan canal. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the Senate joint resolution, and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by those favoring and opposing the Senate joint resolution, the Senate joint resolution shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the Senate joint resolution for amendment the committee shall rise and report the Senate joint resolution to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the Senate joint resolution and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, the intent and purpose of this resolution are fully set forth in the rule itself, which was debated about an hour yesterday and will be further debated under the bill itself. I do not want to take any more of the time of the House, and I move the previous question.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. It is my understanding that this resolution has been reported to-day. It is my recollection of the rule that it must be reported by a two-thirds vote in order to be in order except during the last three days of the session. The parliamentary inquiry is whether this is within the last three days of the session?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hold that it is within the three last days of the session.

The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 117.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman wish to make some arrangement as to the control of the time?

Mr. PARKER. I assumed that the gentleman from Texas would control half of the time. I ask, Mr. Speaker, unanimous consent that one half the time be controlled by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] and the other half by myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. PARKER was then agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. MICHENER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the joint resolution be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, this resolution or practically this resolution was discussed for an hour last night and rather thoroughly discussed. The charge was made that there was no reason for this resolution, that the resolution was brought up with undue haste. If you will refer to the RECORD of December 17, 1928, you will find that the Senator from New Jersey made a very long address in the Senate, in which he advocated the passage of this resolution, and served notice on the Senate that he was going to do his best to secure its adoption. If you have read the papers—both your local papers and the Washington papers during the last three months—you will have seen continuously in these papers a discussion about the consideration of this particular measure. So that I do not think the charge made that this resolution has had no consideration is quite fair.

As to the reason for the resolution, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] talked about bugs under a chip. If he can find one, all well and good. He is a much smarter man than I am, I admit, but let me tell you the plain, ordinary facts about the case. The maximum ability of the Panama Canal is conceded to be 54 boats a day, that is, a 24-hour-day service. Fifty-four boats are all the boats that can go through the Panama Canal in 24 hours. The canal can not be used at that capacity in the dry season, so that 54 boats do not mean the maximum the year around. We are now spending $12,000,000 in Panama on the so-called Alhajuela Dam to insure water that will lift these boats to 85 feet, which they must be lifted from the Atlantic to Gatun Lake. You have to have water to do that. The evaporation in Panama is tremendously great during the dry season. The engineers think that they have water enough to put in a third lock, but that can not be determined until this dam, which is now called the Madden Dam, in honor of the former chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of this House [applause] is completed. How long will that take? The engineers tell us it will be seven years before that dam is completed. We appropriate a million and a half dollars this year to do what? To construct a dam? No; to get ready to construct it. We are building a cement road down there up to the site of the dam, many miles long, instead of building a railroad, which we would have to tear up afterwards. We are building a cement road so that the repairs to the dam can easily be made. When this dam is completed the capacity of the canal will be 54 ships. That is dependent almost entirely upon the mechanical perfection of your locks, and there is not a man here who does not know that any mechanical device is not 100 per cent perfect. You all know that. You all know that those locks will not function 100 per cent all of the time, and the effectiveness of your canal is the effectiveness of your lowest point.

The strength of your chain is the strength of the weakest link. It can not be 54 boats a day. That is too high, because you have not perfection. How many boats have ever been through the canal in one day. The maximum number of boats through the canal in one day is 53. Thirty-five of those were commercial boats and 18 of them were Navy boats. That was a 24-hour operation. If you want to get the facts, they are all in the record, brought out by questions responded to by the governor of the canal, put to him by the gentleman from California and the gentleman from New York, members of the Subcommittee on Appropriations on Military Affairs. They say that you have an average. Your theoretical spread is between 54, the number of boats that theoretically might be put through and your average. Your average is 19 a day. To digress a moment, do you gentlemen realize that in the month of January the receipts of the Panama Canal were $80,000 a day, for tolls? We are not dealing in small business. I am surprised that my friend from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] is against this proposition, because, as I understand it, Government ownership is not objectionable to his theory of government. Here is a pure and simple Government-ownership proposition. The revenues in January were two and a half millions dollars, $80,000 a day.

Mr. QUIN. Will the gentleman give us the difference between the expense and the revenue for the year?

Mr. PARKER. In answer to that, I will say that my information is that the canal paid over 7 per cent on the investment, and that is all that I can say.

Mr. SIROVICH. Would the gentleman be good enough to let us know what the toll charged is for each trip?

Mr. PARKER. I can not tell the gentleman that.

Mr. SIROVICH. The receipts are $80,000 a day.

Mr. PARKER. Yes.

Mr. SIROVICH. And with 20 boats on an average that would be $4,000 a ship.

Mr. PARKER. You all know that your average is not what tells the story, because you have not a constant flow of ships through the canal. You have many more to-day than you will have to-morrow. I have pointed out that the record is 53. Certainly, if the record is 53, you must have some small days to bring it down to 19.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Can the gentleman tell us what the increase is in the volume of business through the canal?

Mr. PARKER. Yes. The Governor of the Canal Zone made the statement that he thought business would increase 10,000,000 tons every 10 years, or 1,000,000 tons a year. We often think of this business as being entirely oil.

We shipped through the canal in 1926, 4,500,000 tons of oil. Last year we shipped through the canal only 600,000 tons, a decrease of nearly 4,000,000 tons. So your increase in the tonnage in the canal is not a matter entirely of the shipment of oil. The decrease in oil means that you are shipping more of the general commodities of commerce, and your increase in tonnage comes from general commerce, not from the shipment of one kind.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman is talking about the Panama Canal entirely?

Mr. PARKER. Entirely.

Mr. RAYBURN. Let me say this to the gentleman from New York: If he will limit this resolution to the Panama Canal and increasing its facilities in time to come, the whole opposition would be withdrawn.

Mr. PARKER. I was quoted yesterday by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] as saying we could not pass this bill in regard to the Nicaraguan canal. I will tell you why we could not do it. It would be the worst business in the world to do it. There is no man living in this House who knows whether we should embark on an expenditure of, perhaps, hundreds of millions of dollars to enlarge the Panama Canal until we know whether we would expend the money to far better purpose by digging a new canal in Nicaragua. No one knows that fact, and all that we do in this resolution is to provide for the ascertainment of the facts. I agree with the gentleman from Texas. If it can be done, I am in favor of enlarging the Panama Canal and not digging a new canal. It does not seem that the House in its wisdom should turn down a resolution of this kind whn it commits us to nothing in the world.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Have the engineers informed the committee how long it would take to build the Nicaragua canal?

Mr. PARKER. No; we have only the old estimates.

Mr. THATCHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER. Yes.

Mr. THATCHER. Have the investigations shown that the Panama Canal can be increased in its capacity and that its capacity ought to be increased and exhausted before we embark on another ambitious program?

Mr. PARKER. That is my personal opinion. This bill does not authorize anything but an investigation.

Mr. THATCHER. Just an investigation?

Mr. PARKER. Yes. You have got to come back to this House after you have obtained these facts and get an authorization to build the Nicaragua canal or to extend the Panama Canal or anything else. This does not bind you to one single thing.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER. Yes.

Mr. McMILLAN. Have the engineers informed the committee how long it would take to make a survey?

Mr. PARKER. The estimates call for two years.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. PARKER. I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 16 minutes remaining.

Mr. COLLINS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, the facilities of the Panama Canal were discussed on December 11, 1928, at some length before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations handling the War Department appropriation bill. Col. Harry Burgess, the Governor of the Canal Zone and in charge of all facilities of the Panama Canal, was on the stand. I dare say he knows as much about the situation down there as any other man in this country, and Governor Burgess testified that the existing facilities there now, with the ratio of increase in the future as in the past, would take care of all traffic for the next 30 years, and in addition to that he testified that with the addition of one lock beside the two at each point along the canal, in other words, the changing of the locks from the duplicate system to the triplicate system, then the canal would take care of all traffic for 60 years hence.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. No; I can not yield; but I am going to read his testimony to you. Here it is. The question was asked of Governor Burgess—

Have you made any estimate of the time when you will have to increase the lockage facilities?

His answer was:

As nearly as we can tell, the increase will not be more than 10,000,000 tons per decade. We are transmitting 30,000,000 tons now. We can take care of 60,000,000 tons before we need the third locks. That indicates a period of about 30 years before we need the third locks.

The addition of this third lock or triplicate system will take care of 30,000,000 tons additional, and 10,000,000 tons increase per decade means that the facilities there now, with this additional third lock, will take care of traffic for 60 years hence.

Now, gentlemen, we might as well approach this subject from the standpoint of business men, and if we do there is certainly no excuse for a proposal for another canal. If we had a hotel that was actually taking care of all business now and able to take care of all future business for 60 years hence, we would not begin the construction of another hotel. To do so would be foolish, and this proposal is on all fours with the illustration.

Governor Burgess is a capable engineer. He is as well equipped, and better so, to give us the facts as they really are than any commission that could be appointed. His is the testimony of a capable man who is in charge of the canal's operation. He is studying it day by day. His conclusions are the result of his best judgment, and his judgment is that of the most experienced officer having to do with the canal's operation.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Is it not a fact that the canal can be electrified so that they can use it at night also?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes; and I thank the gentleman for suggesting this. The canal is operated now only during the day. It can easily be operated at night, and the expense of doing this is small, whereas the cost of building a new canal in Nicaragua would amount to more than a billion dollars.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I really do not know whether this resolution is seriously offered or is being submitted to the House merely for the purpose of a little play. Personally, of course, I do not blame the New York delegation for favoring this legislation or this outlay of money; but I, in a measure, represent the Great Lakes region, and I am especially interested in the welfare of that section of the country—the Middle West. I would like to know what good the Middle West might be expected to derive from this proposed legislation? I know this, that we have for years been endeavoring to secure a waterway, the so-called St. Lawrence project, but certain interests in the East, aided by powerful Canadian influences, have been able to prevent any action upon that much-needed water route that would be of some benefit to the Middle West. I would like to know from the gentlemen representing the farm sections of the Middle West how much good they can expect from this legislation. I admit the Panama Canal—and I voted for all of these appropriations—has done a great deal of good for the Nation. It has saved millions and millions of dollars to the East and to the coasts, but unfortunately the legislation which has been passed in this House during the last 10 or 15 years—notwithstanding the fact that the Middle West always delivers itself to the Republican Party—has not been of benefit to that section of the country. No effort is being made to do anything for that vast territory, for the manufacturing interests, or for the farmers of the Middle West.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Is it not a fact that the Panama Canal has resulted in giving us in the Middle West higher freight rates and placed us at a disadvantage with the two coasts?

Mr. SABATH. There is no question about that. I will take it for granted that these gentlemen are intelligent and honest, but if they are frank, they must admit they have always deliberately discriminated against the Middle West and the people west of the Mississippi.

Mr. KNUTSON. And a canal at Nicaragua would aggravate the situation?

Mr. SABATH. Well, it may increase the discrimination. Of course, we will have one privilege, the privilege of paying additional taxes for the construction of the Nicaraguan canal or the enlargement of the Panama Canal.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from New York, who is always ready to protect his section of the country, and especially his city. I yield to him.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Well, I did not rise for that purpose at this moment. I wanted to ask the gentleman this question: If the opposite party has discriminated against the Middle West, has it ever lost anything politically by such discrimination?

Mr. SABATH. It seems to me it has not, and that is because the people have not really been awakened; they have not seen the light, but I am of the opinion that the time is at hand when they will recognize that they can not expect anything from that party to which they have at all times delivered themselves, and that they will ere long see the light and in the future rally around a party that has their interest at heart and that really desires to aid and protect them. I feel that if the money provided for in this resolution is expended it will not secure much, if any, benefit for our section of the country, but we will have to shoulder an enormous expense.

The gentleman from Wisconsin and the gentleman from New York argue that a Nicaraguan canal should be constructed in the interest of peace and in the interest of the security of the United States as well.

However, I can not forget that when the House was considering the Panama Canal we also heard equally alluring appeals. Many gentlemen who believed themselves experts in military and naval matters assured us the Panama Canal would materially strengthen us in a military way, and that it would obviate the necessity of two fleets and be a great saving in that way; that instead of requiring a fleet in the Atlantic and another in the Pacific, a single fleet, which could pass swiftly through the canal from one ocean to the other, would suffice.

This argument appealed to many as being logical. But, Lord behold, within a short space of time after the work on the canal had gotten well under way, these very same gentlemen, together with the militarists, changed their tunes completely and began pointing out to us the necessity, by the very reason of protecting the Panama Canal, of increasing—yes, doubling—the number of battleships and cruisers and of the entire United States Navy. They now declared that unless this was done the canal and the United States itself would be in grave danger. The Japanese bugaboo, too, was used as a club. So the Navy was greatly enlarged in every respect, as was the Army, and in addition the taxpayers have been forced all these years to meet a tremendous burden of added expense in maintaining and fortifying the Canal Zone and in keeping troops there. What I am wondering is whether history is not going to repeat itself in the case of the proposed Nicaraguan canal.

This resolution, in my judgment, is tantamount to authorization of the construction of a Nicaraguan canal, which is going to cost this Nation more than a thousand million dollars—a billion dollars—and this notwithstanding the fact that the reports show that the Panama Canal can take care of the ever-increasing tonnage passing through the canal for at least 30 years to come.

Why I say this resolution is really tantamount to the authorization of a new canal is because a survey has already been made of a canal route through Nicaragua. It was made before we decided to take over the construction of the Panama Canal. But it seems to me that the eastern and southern influences behind this Nicaraguan project are so great that, regardless of what I may say, or anyone else from the Middle West may say, the resolution will be adopted, and this notwithstanding that when we on the Great Lakes and in the Middle West appeal for even small appropriations for an actually needed water route that would be of great value to our section, such as a 9-foot channel in the Illinois River to complete a water route from the Great Lakes to the Gulf, or seek action upon the St. Lawrence River project to give us an outlet to the seas, our requests are ignored.

How long, I wonder, will the people on the Great Lakes and in the Middle West continue to stand for this discrimination? I for one propose from now on to oppose these tremendous appropriations for waterways and great improvement projects for other sections of the country until some consideration and much-needed relief is given our own greatest manufacturing and farming section in the world.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire how much time has been consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has 18 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Texas has 20 minutes remaining.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN].

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am sorry to see my colleagues opposing this resolution. The United States Government for many years argued through the Congress for some kind of canal. Senator Morgan, of the State of Alabama, when I was a little boy in swaddling clothes, was talking for the Nicaragua canal. It finally wound up by our getting the Panama Canal a few years ago, which men on both sides of the aisle at that time said would be a losing game for the United States.

Just such stuff as the gentleman from Arkansas has preached here was talked 30 years ago; and it has been demonstrated not only with the progressive age we are now living that the Panama Canal was an absolute necessity, but it is also paying 7 per cent profit on the money invested.

What do we care if it does cost $1,000,000,000? It will make your Southern States worth more than $1,000,000,000. It will increase the trade with Central and South American countries and will benefit the Southern States more than it will New York or any other State.

My friend from Chicago says this will not help the Middle West. Look at the railroads now running from Chicago clear down to the Gulf of Mexico. Your country is living off of the South, and yet you object to the railroads running from Chicago to the Gulf of Mexico or to the city of New Orleans. You object to the railroads having freight to carry back to that country that comes off of the vessels coming through the Panama Canal and there would be greatly increased freight in case we established the Nicaragua canal, and yet the gentleman says he is against it because it will not help the Middle West.

A man must be looking through smoked glasses if he believes that a great, world-wide enterprise that takes commerce from all parts of the earth to our next-door neighbor down in Central America will not only benefit New York City, but Arkansas, Texas, Mississippi, Georgia, and every other State of this Republic. The gentleman does not understand and visualize what this means.

Gentlemen of the committee, we can not be narrow-minded when we realize this great Nation of 125,000,000 people is now recognized wherever the flag of commerce, culture, and civilization floats. To sit down and say we can not put out $150,000 to have a survey to see whether we are going to increase the capacity of the Panama Canal or whether it is in the best interests of the country to have another canal built is ridiculous.

The gentleman from Arkansas said it would take 30 years. It took 75 years to get the Panama Canal, and, with such talk as we are having on this floor in opposition to this measure, it will take 75 years to ever get the Nicaragua canal. So it is time to start the survey.

I am for this resolution and hope it will pass. [Applause.]

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, the Panama Canal was constructed as a military necessity, not as a commercial enterprise. It was built and constructed for the purpose of enabling this country to get its fleet from the Atlantic to the Pacific, or from the Pacific to the Atlantic expeditiously, in order to meet any emergency that might arise in the future of this country. Of course, the proponents and advocates of this defense necessity appealed to the cupidity of the people and put it on the basis of a commercial enterprise in order to get them to favorably respond and do the patriotic thing. That has been the history of all similar enterprises in the history of the world. In peace times it is necessary to stimulate the interest of the people in their own defense by pretending and assuming that the national necessity is a commercial enterprise and will yield golden returns. The Nicaragua route was preferable to the Panama Canal but had to be abandoned out of expediency. The Nicaragua route is necessary as an additional safeguard to our national defense for as the Panama Canal is a lock canal and can be blown into infinitesimal smithereens by bombs dropped from enemy airplanes it is the part of prudence and safety to have another canal at Nicaragua making for an insurance that can be secured in no other way and reducing our present risk immeasurably. The Nicaragua canal is preferable to the people of the Mississippi Valley, and the Gulf ports for it places the Gulf ports 600 miles nearer to the West Coast. I am surprised that southern men here who voted for the cruiser bill, the naval bill, the Army bill, making for enormous expenditures all over the country except in their own sections, should oppose this proposed survey and as a justification for their opposition conjure up in their heated imaginations sinister purposes and designs on the part of its proponents and indulge in bolderdash and tommyrot to the effect that the Nicaraguan canal survey will keep the marines in Nicaragua. Did the building of the Panama Canal bring or keep marines in Panama? Bunk, balderdash! Flapdoodle! There is not the remotest connection between the marines in Nicaragua and a proposed survey to ascertain the feasibility of constructing another great canal for defense purposes and to meet the expanding commercial requirements of our country. I can understand some of the Great Lakes people looking for the development of the St. Lawrence and not the Mississippi, fighting this great patriotic and commercial undertaking upon the basis laid down by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], though I hold that they are blind to their own interests and indifferent to ours in not seeing that which would benefit the greater part of the valley would inure to the prosperity of the Nation as a whole. Why does he not go to the Interstate Commerce Commission for the relief which he implies should be given to the Mid West? Why do not he and those of his thought endeavor to secure rates that would be competitive with coastwise water rates through the canal, or why do they not try to place coastwise traffic under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission?

O my friends, why becloud the issue? This is a proposed survey and who can object to finding the facts that will be gathered and laid before the Congress? I am amazed; you vote for bills in the way of enormous expenditures for every section for stupendous ornamental bridges and unnecessary public buildings at a cost of millions, but when it comes to the development of your own section and your own interests you turn your backs upon it. You see visions, and see spooks, you see it as some dreadful monster keeping the marines down there, binding your eyes to the fact and bludgeoning your common sense into the delusion that you can maintain the Monroe doctrine by a policy which would mean that we would not assist in preserving order, and will not permit anyone else to do so. If we will not protect the lives and the property of other nationals how in the name of all that is fair, just, and decent can we object to their own countries doing so, and whenever they will or would do so, that would mean an invasion of, a violation of, the Monroe doctrine, and bring us into military contact with nations that would never consent to endure the intolerable situation that would be presented.

The marines in Nicaragua means for peace with European countries; their withdrawal means chaos in Central America and war with Europe. There are none so blind as those who will not see. There are many idealists who persist in looking at the horizon when they should be looking at their feet. No further elaboration of these remarks is necessary, Mr. Chairman, in view of the report and the many explanatory and brilliant speeches made here to-day in behalf of the resolution.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON].

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, I was opposed to this bill when it came over from the Senate. However, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce struck out everything after the enacting clause and inserted in lieu thereof certain provisions which make it practically an entirely different bill. For example: The title of the Senate bill was, "Authorizing an investigation and survey for a Nicaraguan canal."

Throughout the entire bill there was the emphasis, if not specific commitment, for the building of a new canal, the Nicaraguan canal. The Nicaraguan features appeared in the first part of the Senate bill. Among other provisions of section 1 of the Senate bill the House struck out the following:

> The investigation and survey [of the Nicaraguan route] which shall be made upon the basis of a canal having a capacity sufficient for the convenient passage of vessels of such tonnage and draft as may reasonably be anticipated.

This language our committee struck out.

The Senate bill contained several sections referring to the treaty between the Republic of Nicaragua and the United States. In this connection there was a provision which in the original text of the Senate bill read as follows:

> The President of the United States is hereby authorized and empowered to enter into negotiations for an agreement upon the details of the terms under which such canal may be constructed, operated, and maintained.

The convention between the United States and Nicaragua, signed in 1914 and consented to in 1916, contained a provision whereby Nicaragua granted certain interoceanic canal rights to the United States. Among the provisions thereof in Article 1 of the treaty is a grant of the right to construct a canal—

> The details of the terms upon which such canal shall be constructed, operated, and maintained to be agreed to by the two governments whenever the Government of the United States shall notify the Government of Nicaragua of its desire or intention to construct such canal.

Did not the text in the original Senate bill contain sufficient language to notify Nicaragua within the meaning of the treaty of a commitment and intention upon the part of the United States to construct the canal? Apparently the Senate thought that it did or that, at least, it might be so contended, for the Senate inserted a proviso to the contrary. Our committee, however, struck out the entire proposition and any reference to the treaty.

In section 6 of the Senate bill there was a direct appropriation made of $150,000. That is the amount of the authorization in this bill. In addition, however, there was inserted this language:

and there are hereby authorized to be appropriated such additional moneys as may be necessary for such purposes.

The purposes, of course, were those set forth in the Senate bill. The principal purpose of the Senate bill was a practical commitment by this Government to the construction of the Nicaragua canal. Our committee struck out this general blanket authorization. If we had not done so, there would have been an authorization for the expenditure of any sum of money necessary for the purpose of making the investigation and survey.

The above are the provisions, therefore, that we in the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House saw fit to strike out before reporting this measure to the House because we did not want to commit this Government to the Nicaraguan route either by direct commitment or even by undue emphasis or a blanket authorization of expenditure.

As amended what does the bill do? That is best expressed in the new title of the bill which reads as follows:

Joint resolution authorizing an investigation and survey for the purpose of ascertaining the practicability and the approximate cost of constructing and maintaining additional locks and other facilities at the Panama Canal, and for the purpose of ascertaining the practicability and probable cost of constructing and maintaining an interoceanic ship canal across the Republic of Nicaragua.

Note that the investigation of additional facilities at Panama comes first and that the Nicaraguan route comes second in the title.

Section 1 of the new bill authorizes a survey relating to enlarging facilities at Panama.

Section 2 of the bill which relates to the Nicaraguan route, reads as follows:

The President is hereby authorized to cause to be made, under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers, and with the aid of such civilian engineers as the President shall deem advisable, a full and complete investigation and survey for the purpose of revising and bringing down to date the reports of the Isthmian Canal Commission transmitted to Congress, with respect to the practicability and advantages and approximate cost of constructing a canal across Nicaragua, and for the purpose of obtaining all additional available information respecting (1) the most practical route for an interoceanic ship canal across the Republic of Nicaragua by way of the San Juan River and the Great Lake of Nicaragua, or by way of any other route over Nicaraguan territory, including suitable locations for harbors at each of the termini thereof; (2) the practicability and approximate cost of constructing and maintaining such canal; and (3) the approximate cost of acquiring all private rights, properties, privileges, and franchises, if any, included in or necessarily affected by such canal route.

Note there is provided the following:

Bringing down to date the reports of the original Isthmian Canal Commission with the object of obtaining information as to practicability, approximate cost, and other information, including approximate cost of maintenance and acquiring of rights as well as approximate cost of construction.

Note that there is no commitment whatever. There is no emphasis upon the Nicaraguan route. The provisions pertaining to Nicaragua are not substantially dissimilar from those pertaining to the enlargement of the facilities at Panama.

I am going into this matter in detail because I am one of those who must be shown before he is going to vote for the construction of another isthmian canal. The construction of the Panama Canal has worked havoc with some of the industries in the upper Mississippi Valley. To-day it is possible to ship a goodly number of commodities by rail from Mississippi River points to the Atlantic seaboard and from there by boat to the Panama Canal and to the north Pacific coast for less than it costs to ship the same commodity by rail from the same point to the north Pacific coast. Some of our industries, by reason of this fact, have been placed at a distinct disadvantage. We do not want that disadvantage aggravated or increased. We have a well-grounded fear that such would be the case if another canal was constructed. There is no question but what the bill as it came from the Senate would have been a practical commitment to a new route. Therefore I want to say to my good friends who feel as I do about this matter that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has done some very excellent work in eliminating these provisions so objectionable to us. As amended, the resolution is a straight out and out modest authorization for information, with no commitments for a new route or even for an extended survey in the event that a proposal should be made in the future for substantially additional authorizations of money.

It has been said, authorize the investigation as to the Panama Canal; but why even seek information on the other route? Information without implied or expressed commitment at no great expense is not going to harm anybody. Bear in mind that we paid Nicaragua $3,000,000 for this option for the right to construct a canal. We have that much money invested. Our engineers some years ago made an extensive survey and an exhaustive report. With this investment and with the propaganda that is going on for the construction of a canal in another route, it would seem to me that we ought to be willing to spend a little money to bring that report down to date so that we may have up-to-date information. In substance, that is all that there is in this bill in so far as the Nicaraguan route is concerned.

Mr. Chairman, the recent agitation for the construction of this Nicaraguan route commenced last summer, as I recall it. I do not believe that its construction is at all necessary, but that is no reason why I should oppose any reasonable effort to acquire information.

Now then, if after the investigation has been made and a report is submitted, this is followed by a movement to construct such a canal, I shall undoubtedly oppose it and oppose it vigorously. We in the upper Mississippi Valley are in substantial accord on the proposition that before there is to be any new Isthmian Canal route or any substantial enlargement of existing facilities for the construction of one, for which we will be taxed with the rest of the country, that substantial progress be made toward the construction of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway project and the development of our inland riverways system. The development of our inland rivers through the deepening of our channels to a generally uniform and standard depth where there can be an interchange of freight, is absolutely essential for the people of the Middle West; we need a 9-foot channel. I want to again state that substantial progress along these lines must be made before there should be any construction of a new Isthmian Canal in Nicaragua or anywhere else.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, let me again reiterate that this amended resolution merely seeks information. It does not commit the Government to the construction of another route, nor does it even emphasize that. I shall, therefore, support the resolution as it has been so substantially amended by our committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am opposed to the passage of this resolution. In the first place, when a committee of which I am a member brings legislation into this House, I have pride enough in the committee to want it to come before the House with enough information about the proposed legislation to intelligently tell the House of Representatives the reason why it should be enacted. This resolution came to our committee about three days ago, a resolution involving not only great national but great international problems. It came there and was taken up without one word of hearing, without one scintilla of testimony. When those of us who wanted to know something about the resolution asked why we should vote for it and what were the facts about the Panama Canal as to its present capacity and its capacity to take care of the ships that might pass through it in the future, we were asked to read a Senator's speech and get the information we desired in order to pass on a great question like this.

I am amused at some of the gentlemen here who say that we should vote for this resolution because if this canal is built there will be some money expended in our section of the United States. What is the hurry about this? Why not have knowledge as to the capacity of the Panama Canal? The Governor of the Panama Canal Zone said in his testimony before the Committee on Appropriations that before the Panama Canal would need enlarging, it could take care of all the commerce that would want to go through it for 30 years to come. Then why build another canal? Why do you want to investigate the Nicaragua route again when it was abandoned because it was impracticable, because the cost of digging the canal there was prohibitive. If we want to increase the capacity of the canal, why not limit this resolution to an investigation of the Panama Canal and that alone? Do you want to have another canal that will increase your foreign entanglements? Do you want to have another canal that you will have to defend, if such a time ever comes?

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. PARKER. Does not the gentleman think it wise, while we are ascertaining facts about the Panama Canal, to also find out if it would be advisable, from a business standpoint, to dig the Nicaragua canal?

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not, for the simple reason that I do not think we ought to go into negotiations with any other country in Central America as long as there is a canal that we can broaden or deepen and increase, which we already have.

Mr. PARKER. Have we not already gone into those negotiations? Did we not go into them under the Wilson administration, and was there not a treaty made with Nicaragua by Mr. Bryan?

Mr. RAYBURN. Oh, yes; but this is the first time anybody has ever suggested that we operate under it.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SIROVICH. This resolution appropriates $150,000 to make a survey of the Nicaragua route. Was there ever a survey made of the proposed Nicaragua canal before the Panama Canal was built?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; and it was abandoned and the Panama Canal was dug.

Mr. KNUTSON. This measure is simply the entering wedge for the construction of a Nicaragua canal, is it not? This is preliminary, and if we want to block it now is the time to block it.

Mr. RAYBURN. I think we ought to strike everything out of this resolution except with reference to investigating the capacity of the Panama Canal. I wanted a hearing on this resolution, and the reason was I wanted to find out who it is who wants to open up negotiations with Nicaragua. I wanted to find out what bug is under the chip, and why the United States wants to open up again negotiations with Nicaragua. If we had had time to investigate the subject, if we had called witnesses before the committee who had information on the question, we would have been able to develop whether or not this proposition is a business proposition, whether we shall dig a canal at Nicaragua, or whether the $150,000 is an entering wedge to spend millions of dollars there to try to pull somebody out of an international mess.

Mr. PARKER. Does the gentleman think we could determine whether it is a good business proposition without having a survey?

Mr. RAYBURN. It has been abandoned once as a bad business proposition.

Mr. SABATH. There is already a survey.

Mr. RAYBURN. There was a survey, and everyone, to begin with, was in favor of digging the canal through Nicaragua, but after the investigation, after the survey, they abandoned that route, and went to Panama, where we now have our fortifications and our canal in operation, and where, with a few more men to operate it, we can take care of the commerce there, and we will then have only one canal to protect. What I protest against in the passage of this resolution, and every other resolution involving great questions, is being asked to support it without information or an attempt to get information.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. MEAD. I am wondering if the necessity for this legislation could be based on the fear of earthquake or slides or lack of water or any other physical condition imperiling the Panama Canal. Is there anything like that in this question?

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not know. We called no experts. We did not know anything about it. That is the reason why I do not like legislation of this character crammed down our throats in the dying hours of a session without hearings and without explanation.

Mr. PARKER. Whom would you expect to give the information?

Mr. RAYBURN. I should expect some one sponsoring this resolution to give us some information. I should like to ask some few questions.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The object of this resolution apparently is to revise and bring down to date the estimates of the Isthmian Canal Commission. Does the gentleman think the lapse of time has so changed conditions that the estimates should be brought down to date?

Mr. RAYBURN. Not at all.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. They have had a number of earthquakes down there along the line of the proposed canal. They have them so frequently that it would take a good many investigations to keep up with them.

Mr. RAYBURN. I think what the House ought to do would be to strike out everything in this resolution except the authorization of an investigation of the facilities of the Panama Canal. After we shall have done that, then we can go down there to some other country and begin to negotiate treaties and agreements and to acquire property on which to build another canal. I protest now, as I have always protested in this House, against legislation which is brought up in the dying hours of a session, with no information on the subject, and which is attempted to be jammed down the throat of Congress. Why in this resolution can you not cut out Nicaragua? We must ask the Senate of the United States to do it before we can put it in an appropriation. If the Senate agrees to this and the House does not agree to it, why not abandon it?

Mr. PARKER. Does the gentleman think this resolution ought to be changed?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes. I would rather have none; but if you are investigating merely the Panama Canal, then you are doing something.

Mr. NEWTON. Does not the gentleman understand that the House very substantially amended the Senate resolution?

Mr. RAYBURN. I think the House should still more amend the Senate resolution, so that we will know what we are doing. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas yields back the balance of his time.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, has the gentleman from Texas exhausted his time?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas has two minutes remaining.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, with the understanding that the gentleman from Texas has used all his time, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, before our Government constructed the Panama Canal many able engineers in this country thought the canal ought to be built at Nicaragua. We appointed a commission, which made an exhaustive study of both routes, and that commission unanimously recommended Nicaragua. Some of the ablest men in the Senate and in the House thought we ought to construct the canal across Nicaragua, but Congress at that time decided otherwise.

Now, whether we approve of it or not, in 1914, the President of the United States negotiated a treaty with the Republic of Nicaragua, which was approved by the Senate. That was done during the administration of President Wilson. That treaty gave us the right to construct a ship canal across the Republic of Nicaragua.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Was that done under the Wilson administration?

Mr. DENISON. Yes; that was done under the Wilson administration, and Mr. Bryan negotiated the treaty.

Mr. MONTAGUE. For a canal across the Isthmus of Panama?

Mr. DENISON. Across Nicaragua.

Now we have that right. I am in favor of this resolution. We will always retain that right unless Congress takes some action looking to either utilizing it or surrendering it, and I think that as long as we have this rather incomplete canal right by the treaty negotiated in 1914 it is liable to be used as an excuse for interfering or intervening down there in that country. I think this Government ought to have an exhaustive survey made of the proposed Nicaragua route and find out whether it is practicable to build a canal there and ascertain what it will probably cost. If the investigation shows that it will be impracticable, or shows that it is going to cost too much, then our Government ought to abandon the rights we have there under the treaty of 1914 and get out.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

Mr. DENISON. The only way that will ever be done and the only way we will ever get action is to have a complete investigation and survey made, as provided in the pending resolution, and find out the facts.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. DENISON. I am sorry I can not yield. I have only five minutes.

I think it is good business and good policy to make this investigation, so that our Government can determine the course it is going to pursue with reference to Nicaragua.

Mr. CROSSER. Is there any such big rush as seems to be assumed at this hour? Assuming all the gentleman says to be true—and I admit there is some force in what he says—would it not be better to have some one called here to give us an explanation of the foreign policy they have in mind?

Mr. DENISON. I will say this to my friend from Ohio: The State Department recommends that this be done; the War Department recommends that it be done; the Secretary of War, who has general supervision over the Panama Canal, recommends that it be done; the Navy Department recommends that it be done; the President is agreeable to it, and the Bureau of the Budget approves it.

Mr. PARKS. Why did they not come before the committee?

Mr. DENISON. They did come before the Senate committee and their views are all in the report. The resolution was submitted to all these departments of the Government and their replies are all in the report, so I think the House has ample evidence upon which to act.

Now, the testimony of Colonel Burgess, the Governor of the Panama Canal Zone, has been read here. I have recently been to the Panama Canal Zone. I am intensely interested in that project and I happen to be the chairman of the subcommittee that handles all Panama Canal legislation. I am a believer in the future of the Panama Canal, and I think I know the feelings of the Governor of the Panama Canal, Colonel Burgess. I believe he thinks this investigation ought to be made.

Mr. PARKS. An investigation of the Panama Canal or of the Nicaraguan route?

Mr. DENISON. Both of them. I think they ought to go together, and such an investigation and survey will have to be made sooner or later. If that is so, why not go ahead and have it made now? The sooner we make a complete investigation and survey of the Nicaraguan route and the sooner the House and the Senate are fully informed as to what it will cost to build a canal there, and whether or not it will be practicable, the better it will be for this country in order to enable us to determine our policy toward Nicaragua as well as toward the Republic of Panama. In short, if this investigation and survey should show that it is practicable to construct an interoceanic ship canal across Nicaragua, and that the cost of such a canal would not be prohibitive, then our Government should fully protect our rights under the treaty of 1914 from interference from any source. But if it should show that such a canal would be impracticable, or that the cost would be prohibitive, then we should surrender our rights under the treaty and withdraw from further special interests there.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. All time has expired, and the Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be read in lieu of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. FISH. Reserving the right to object, will that cut anybody off from striking out the last word?

Mr. PARKER. That is not the intention at all.

Mr. BURTNESS. Reserving the right to object, in the event the amendment is read, how would amendments be proposed after the reading of each section or at the end of the entire amendment?

Mr. PARKER. After the reading of the entire committee amendment, which is the entire resolution.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, would not the gentleman from New York think it better to consider the amendment as the bill and read the amendment by sections, as though we were reading the bill instead of considering the amendment as an entirety and reading it from beginning to end without stopping? If it can be arranged to read the amendment in lieu of the bill and deal with it by sections, as though we were reading the original bill, I shall have no objection.

Mr. PARKER. I simply ask unanimous consent to have the amendment read in lieu of the bill. I do not wish to shut off anybody from offering any amendment that they may see fit to offer, but I do believe we should have it read all at once. I believe we should read the amendment and then offer such amendments to it as are desired to be offered.

Mr. SABATH. But there are several sections, and if the unanimous consent is granted Members will be prevented from offering any amendment to the various sections.

Mr. PARKER. Not at all; and that is not the intention.

Mr. SABATH. So that amendments to the respective sections will be in order?

Mr. PARKER. That is my understanding.

Mr. RAYBURN. Will not the gentleman ask that it be read section by section?

Mr. PARKER. I prefer to have it read the other way. It makes no difference, and I think it will expedite matters.

Mr. RAYBURN. Well, it might not. I do not want to object and have the original Senate bill read and thus waste time.

Mr. PARKER. I am only making this request for the purpose of saving time and not for the purpose of shutting off anybody from offering any amendment they please to offer.

Mr. RAYBURN. I think it would save time if it is read section by section.

Mr. PARKER. If I do not secure this unanimous consent, I shall move to have it read in that way.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President is hereby authorized to cause to be made, under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers, and such civilian engineers as the President deems advisable, a full and complete investigation and survey for the purpose of revising and bringing down to date the reports of the Isthmian Canal Commission transmitted to the Congress, and for the purpose of collecting the additional information and data necessary in order to ascertain (1) the most practicable route for an interoceanic ship canal by way of the San Juan River and Great Lake of Nicaragua or by way of any route over Nicaraguan territory, including a suitable harbor at each of the termini thereof; (2) the feasibility and approximate cost of the construction and maintenance of such canal; and (3) the cost of acquiring all private rights, privileges, and franchises, if any, pertaining to such route. The investigation and survey shall be made upon the basis of a canal having a capacity sufficient for the convenient passage of vessels of such tonnage and draft as may reasonably be anticipated.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, has the entire bill been read?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would inform the gentleman that we are reading the bill under the general rules of the House section by section. Amendments will be in order at the conclusion of the reading of any section of the stricken-out part of the bill.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the entire bill. I am not opposed to it for the reasons given, that it might keep our marines in Nicaragua. I believe both factions in Nicaragua, the Conservatives and the Liberals—and if there are any other factions, those, too—would agree unanimously in favor of the United States coming down there and spending hundreds of millions of American dollars to dig this 180-mile ditch. There is no question about that. You could not find anybody in Nicaragua who does not want us to come down there and spend our money. It is not a question of whether the marines are to stay in Nicaragua or whether they are to get out.

I am opposed to this resolution because it amounts virtually to a commitment to build the Nicaraguan canal, and we will be led right into appropriating $500,000,000 or $1,000,000,000 within a year or so to dig a 180-mile canal in a foreign country which we do not need.

I am opposed to this whole proposition, and I hope that the Representatives of the farmers of the Western States will pay some attention to the purposes of this legislation. For the last eight years they have been promising their farmer constituents in the Middle Western States that they were about to start building an all-American route, or the St. Lawrence route, to permit ships to go from the interior to Europe. Certain Western States have subsidized the St. Lawrence route, and when and where in the world do you expect to get the money for either the St. Lawrence route or the New York route if you go ahead and make a virtual commitment for $1,000,000,000 now to be spent in Nicaragua?

Let me say further to the farmers from the West—from Minnesota and the other Western States—I appreciate that they are committed to the St. Lawrence route, and they honestly believe that the politicians in Canada are staying up at night thinking out ways and means to help dig an ocean ship canal from the Great Lakes to the St. Lawrence River. What the farmers want is a canal. They want either the St. Lawrence route or the New York route, and let me tell you this:

The good people of Canada are not staying up nights over the St. Lawrence route. They are in many sections opposed to the St. Lawrence route. It is the biggest unexploded myth before the country at the present time. It is subsidized by huge water-power interests, and yet the farmers out West honestly believe there is a chance for the St. Lawrence route. Why, the city of Montreal, with 1,000,000 population, has not any idea at all of giving up its position at the head of ocean traffic. The Province of Quebec, with one-third of the population of Canada, is united in its opposition to the St. Lawrence route.

What the farmers of the West want is a waterway, a ship canal to the Atlantic Ocean. They do not care whether it goes through New York or whether it goes by the St. Lawrence River. I believe I know something about the Canadian point of view because I happen to spend a part of the summer in Canada on the St. Lawrence River. I have talked with many of the officials in the Province of Quebec. I have talked with the prime minister, M. Taschereau and have had lunch with him. He is not under any illusion about the building of the St. Lawrence canal at this time or in the near future. There is no more chance of building the St. Lawrence canal than of repealing the eighteenth amendment in our time and generation. [Applause.] It is a lot of humbug that has been sold to the farmer out West. What you want is a ship canal to the Atlantic Ocean, and if you want such a canal you should vote against this resolution which will commit us before we know it to building the Nicaragua canal.

If you want $500,000,000 or $1,000,000,000 next year or five years from now to build a ship canal to help lower the freight rates, if you want to keep your promises and your pledges to the farmers back home, you have got to vote down this resolution, because this is the entering wedge and amounts to a commitment for the Nicaragua canal, and that is all there is to it. You can not have the Nicaragua canal and the St. Lawrence canal or the New York waterway. It can not be done. We can not appropriate one-half billion dollars one year for Nicaragua and another one-half billion dollars for the New York route.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Lousiana. Why does not the gentleman want the Nicaragua canal?

Mr. FISH. The gentleman asks why I do not want the Nicaragua canal. Because I am convinced that the Panama Canal has sufficient facilities to take care of the necessary traffic for the next 60 years if we put in a third lock. The governor of the canal has stated officially that we do not need more than one more lock to take care of the traffic requirements for the next 60 years.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield, yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Is the gentleman in favor of the St. Lawrence canal?

Mr. FISH. I am certainly not, for many sound reasons, and besides Canada is against it and there is no chance of it being constructed. The Western States are for it, but the Province of Quebec with one-third of the population of Canada is strongly opposed to it and so are the big Canadian railroads.

Mr. SCHAFER. The people of the great Western States that the gentleman has referred to are for it?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. NEWTON. I would like to inquire of the Chair if, after having read the first section, the committee amendment is now in order or whether it will be necessary, under the rules of the House, to read every section of the Senate bill when the committee amendment will then be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. In answer to the gentleman's inquiry, the Chair would suggest that what he has stated is in order. However, the general practice of the House and the best practice is that when a bill is considered by section or paragraph, a substitute for the whole bill is properly offered after reading for amendment is concluded. Therefore, either course would be in order. The Chair recommends the latter course as being preferable.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, I did not hear the last remark of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The recommendation of the Chair is that the usual rule be followed and that the strickén part of the bill be read complete before the committee amendment is offered.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CHALMERS. Since the Chair has recognized the gentleman from New York on a pro forma amendment, I ask if the Chair would recognize me for five minutes to oppose the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has his rights under the rules. Does the gentleman demand recognition in opposition to the pro forma amendment?

Mr. CHALMERS. I demand recognition; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CHALMERS] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Chairman, I admire the gentleman from New York on account of his ability, on account of what he has done and is doing, and also I admire him because of his imagination. [Laughter.] He says that the St. Lawrence canal will not be built in his day or mine. I want to say to the gentleman that in my judgment the St. Lawrence canal will be provided for in a treaty between this country and Canada within the next four years. [Applause.] I have great faith in the big chief who will take the reins of this Government at high noon on next Monday. He will bring about, with the assistance of this House and the other body, a treaty to build the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway. There is not any possibility of stopping that great human necessity. We farmers of the West, 28 States landlocked, that have been praying for what is considered the birthright of humanity since the dawn of creation—an outlet to the sea.

The gentleman from New York recommends the New York route. Over and over again the New York route has been reported upon adversely by the experts as an economic impossibility. There is no such report standing against the St. Lawrence route. It is God's way to the sea from the Mid West.

We have 241,000 cubic feet of water flowing into the St. Lawrence River every second from Lake Ontario, down hill all the way, carrying our products from the West to the sea.

I know we will have some difficulty in adjusting the treaty with Canada, but the main obstacle there is New York influence. I do not see why New York is opposed to this great economic necessity. It is going to come within four years.

Do you know that New York seems to be afraid that if the farmers in the West have the right to build the St. Lawrence waterway that it will turn that great metropolitan city back into a cow pasture or a country village? That grass will again grow on Broadway. Fifth Avenue will become a sheep pasture and the lambs will go unmolested even down in Wall Street. [Laughter.]

Mr. SABATH. They are taking care of the lambs in Wall Street now. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the committee substitute for the Senate bill be read section by section.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the President is hereby authorized to cause to be made, under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers, and with the aid of such civilian engineers as the President shall deem advisable, a full and complete investigation and survey for the purpose of ascertaining the practicability and the approximate cost of constructing and maintaining (1) such additional locks and other facilities at the Panama Canal as may be necessary to provide for the future needs of interoceanic shipping; and (2) any other route for a ship canal between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, if I did not believe that the people I have the honor to represent have a vital interest in this proposition I would not take the floor a second time. But, gentlemen, keep in mind that the Panama Canal was built as a military necessity, as a part of our national defense. [Applause.] Never let that escape your mind. And that canal should have been a sea-level canal. Everyone well informed in the history of that day knows that some powerful interests, political and otherwise, had frustrated every attempt to construct a sea-level canal. Everyone knows that the contracting interests were determined that it should be a dam-and-lock canal or no canal at all. Everyone knows that the great statesmen of that day and generation made it reluctantly, as an unreasonable concession, which they were powerless to refuse in view of the supreme necessity of getting a canal, lock or no lock. That canal was built, I repeat, my colleagues, for military purposes as a part of the national defenses and a fortiori, as the lawyers say, we need a second canal to insure that defense, which is just as pressing to-day as then, if not more so, in view of the development of airplanes, bombing planes, and airplane carriers. And keep in mind, we do not own the Panama Canal, and I rest on that proposition with all of its tremendous implications and inferences. You know that President Wilson, in language unmistakable and unforgettable, asked Congress to repeal the toll provisions in the Panama Canal act. That message indicated to many of his countrymen that he was acting under some great stress or felt a menacing attitude from some country beyond the Atlantic Ocean. We do not own the canal! President Wilson's interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and the repeal by the Congress of the Panama Canal toll act indicate that we agree that we are not in that control which goes to ownership.

The debate has taken a wide range, but it is on the anvil of discussion, the spark of truth will fly, though some hold that too much discussion obscures if it does not entirely conceal the truth.

Therefore let us act and pass this resolution for a survey and if necessary let us dig this other canal, which will prevent war, which will not cost one-hundredth part of the cost of the World War to us, and which will bind us to Nicaragua, for be it remembered that the press carried the pleasing news when the President elect was down there on his good-will trip that the officials there indicated to him their pleasure and satisfaction at the construction of the prospective canal. And by whom will the survey be made? By the same sort of a commission that is in control of the flood works in the Mississippi Valley, which everyone knows will cost approximately $500,000,000. If that sort of a commission can undertake and execute the greatest domestic work in the history of the country, why can it not be trusted to make a survey at a cost of $150,000?

Mr. Chairman, I am for waterways. I am for the St. Lawrence project, if you can get the preliminaries settled by agreement with Canada. I am for the development of the Mississippi River and its wonderful tributaries. I am for the development of all waterways. It will expand our commerce and make for the glory and the grandeur of this country. I appeal to my southern colleagues not to turn down a proposition which makes for the development of their section, which will lead to a waterway connection that will give us in a few years vast returns and make for an opulence and a splendor that can come only with utilization of every available avenue of commerce. Do not turn your backs on your interests out of a mere fetish worship of some visionary, idealistic notion that you are hugging to your souls and remote from the practical demands of your own civilization. [Applause.]

Do not strain your vision for base purposes and sinister designs in the conduct of those who are seeking to secure the national defense and make for the acquisition of another canal if the survey and investigation show one to be necessary. The returns on the new canal, if built, would in my judgment exceed the amount expended for its construction. Do not question too searchingly the motives of those who honestly believe in a progress which may not appeal to you. There is no "bug under the chip," unless there is a bug under the chip in your opposition to a survey which will discover facts that have come into existence since the old survey and upon which we can predicate the future.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. The President is hereby authorized to cause to be made, under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers, and with the aid of such civilian engineers as the President shall deem advisable, a full and complete investigation and survey for the purpose of revising and bringing down to date the reports of the Isthmian Canal Commission transmitted to Congress, with respect to the practicability and advantages and approximate cost of constructing a canal across Nicaragua, and for the purpose of obtaining all additional available information respecting (1) the most practical route for an interoceanic ship canal across the Republic of Nicaragua by way of the San Juan River and the Great Lake of Nicaragua, or by way of any other route over Nicaraguan territory, including suitable locations for harbors at each of the termini thereof; (2) the practicability and approximate cost of constructing and maintaining such canal; and (3) the approximate cost of acquiring all private rights, properties, privileges, and franchises, if any, included in or necessarily affected by such canal route.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered to the committee amendment by Mr. BURTNESS: Page 5, line 6, strike out all of section 2.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am offering this amendment in all sincerity, and yet I admit that it is done with some hesitation.

I agree thoroughly with the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON] that the resolution reported by way of a substitute by the House committee is a great improvement over the Senate resolution. It is because I was, with others, instrumental in greatly improving the resolution by the committee amendment that I hesitate in asking further to strike out section 2. The Senate resolution as it came to the House, it seemed to some of us at least, was an absolute commitment on the part of this country, or would have been construed as such, to the building of the Nicaraguan Canal. You will note that the amendment proposed by the committee makes the Nicaraguan survey in a way secondary, and puts provisions into the first section of the resolution for an investigation to determine what can be done at the Panama Canal by building new locks and additional facilities of any sort so as to take care of the shipping needs of the future, making the survey of the Panama Canal paramount. And yet when we come to section 2 we find in it a very definite provision with reference to the Nicaraguan Canal, which might also be construed by many as a commitment to the building thereof. Surely we can well imagine that in a year or two from now our good friend from Louisiana [Mr. O'CONNOR], who made such an excellent speech here a few minutes ago, from his viewpoint, would at least argue very specifically, in the event of the passage of this resolution, that we are committed to such purpose, if for no other reason than as a military necessity. The speech made by him would give some justification for that contention.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTNESS. I can not yield now. Let us see what my amendment would do. I submit, if you strike out section 2, you retain everything that is reasonably necessary, whether it be for investigating what may be the need for enlarging the Panama Canal, as well as what may be reasonably proper and necessary at this time in the matter of surveying routes for ship canals between the Atlantic and the Pacific Oceans, because I call your attention to subdivision 2, found on page 5, in line 4 of that page.

You still have a general provision there so that the engineers of the War Department and the civilian engineers may use this money to the limit of $150,000, as now proposed, for the general purpose of making a reasonably accurate survey and informing the people of this country as to the results thereof. Of course, that was not the intent of the survey provided by the Senate bill, and I doubt whether it is the intent of the survey provided by section 2. The Senate resolution laid its main emphasis on the Nicaraguan route, appropriated $150,000 to start with, and made the sky the limit with reference to future appropriations to complete the work. No one knows to-day whether the cost of those surveys will amount to half a million dollars or five million dollars. I think every member of the committee will agree that $150,000 can not possibly provide for the cost of the surveys contemplated by section 2, in addition to the survey of the facts with reference to the Panama Canal, contemplated by section 1, and when an attempt is made to make that limitation, it becomes more or less of a camouflage, if all of the purposes of the resolution are going to be carried out.

Remember this, also. If you vote to retain section 2 in the resolution, our adopting it will not necessarily mean it will be enacted in this way. It will have to go to conference, and you will be conferring there with the other body upon the malicious provisions that are found in the Senate resolution which would not only commit us to the building of the Nicaraguan canal but is a mandate to the President of the United States to enter into negotiations not only with Nicaragua but also with other countries, to do what?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota has expired.

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, in the Senate resolution there is a mandate to the effect that the President shall open up negotiations with Nicaragua that will absolutely decide the details under which the canal shall be operated if it is constructed.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTNESS. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Does not the gentleman think that the provision in the Senate resolution, the second paragraph on page 3, is a wise provision to include in the resolution pending here?

Mr. BURTNESS. Yes. I would not object to that at all. I think it would be a rather wise provision.

Mr. Chairman, out in the Northwest where the burden of the cost of the Panama Canal weighs more heavily on the people than anywhere else in the country, in the manner of higher transportation costs on our products, we are not opposed to providing facilities that will make it possible for our commerce and for our naval ships or for any other commerce that needs a canal to pass from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Not at all. But we do say this, that I think the entire Middle West and the Northwest are ready to give notice to the country that we are not going to entertain a proposition of actually building a second canal until we shall have found an outlet from the Great Lakes to the sea.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTNESS. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I want information. I want to know what is the present capacity of the Panama Canal to take care of the ships that want to go through there now.

Mr. BURTNESS. That has been given several times. We had no formal hearings on it in our committee, but I understand that the average number of ships going through per day is about 19 with a maximum capacity of 54. Additional facilities can be provided. We are already committed in a way to the enlargement of the facilities of the Panama Canal, for otherwise why are we spending money in the appropriation bills from year to year to build a dam across the Chagres River to impound water there to add to the water of the Panama Canal? It is believed that when that water becomes available it will take care of another set of locks. That is the information I have. One additional set of locks will practically double the capacity of the canal.

Mr. RAMSEYER. From the information before your committee, is there any commercial need for another canal at this time?

Mr. BURTNESS. Absolutely not; and there is no existing emergency. If additional facilities that might be built at Panama under a survey such as provided in section 1, it would probably take care of the needs for from 30 to 50 years. Such a survey alone will take a few months. Let us get information on that first, and upon obtaining that information let us proceed to do what ought to be done. We can then determine in a more judicial way than now possible whether we should provide for a Nicaraguan survey in addition.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Is there any information before the committee indicating the necessity of enlarging the Panama Canal?

Mr. BURTNESS. There was not a single witness that appeared before the committee on that point, and the best information I know of with reference to the subject can be found not in the hearings on this resolution, but in the hearings had before the Subcommittee on Military Affairs of the Appropriations Committee. I do know there is no emergency now existing.

Mr. RAMSEYER. What was the cost mentioned in the report of the committee on the Nicaraguan project?

Mr. BURTNESS. I do not know what the cost could or would be. I doubt whether anyone knows. Personally, in so far as dealing with the proposed Nicaraguan route is concerned, I do not believe there is any justification for it. I think, however, there is ample justification and ground for getting complete information as to the cost and practicability of providing enlarged facilities in the Panama Canal project as provided by section 1 of this bill. I think it would be a worth-while piece of legislation. If it is enacted, the Chief of Engineers and the President can proceed to determine in a scientific and engineering way just what we can accomplish at Panama in the way of providing additional facilities. They can also give to the country and to Congress their best judgment, after thorough economic surveys, of the shipping needs of the future. It will then be early enough to decide about a Nicaraguan survey.

For these reasons I urge that section 2 be stricken from the bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words of the gentleman's amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I find that on this occasion I regret that I am not in agreement with a great many of my colleagues with whom I generally agree and with whom I often find myself in the minority. I do not look at this resolution in the light of solely military purpose, but am attracted to it for its useful commercial purposes and its tremendous peace potentialities.

This proposition has nothing to do with any other canal, so it is only confusing the issue to bring in a discussion of any other canal at this time. We eventually will build this canal and we will also build other great canals.

Now, gentlemen, it is stated that at the present time we do not need additional canal facilities down on the Isthmus. That may be true, but as legislators here we have more important duties than passing private bills for the relief of John Jones or John Smith, and a legislator is not worth his salt unless he has sufficient vision to look 50, 75, or even 100 years into the future. [Applause.] The very opposition here to-day indicates that even after the survey is completed it will take many years before we will be able to start the actual digging of this canal. There is nothing in the argument that we will not have sufficient funds with which to undertake this project and another canal project for the reason that if there is one thing this country has too much of it is money. I would sooner see our enormous surplus expended in such useful projects beneficial to all humanity than in a race of competitive armaments.

I want to say that in addition to the so-called military necessity I look at this project as another great agency of peace. It can not be said that the Panama Canal, which brought us nearer to the Orient, has in any way stimulated war. The Panama Canal brought peace, and the nearer we can get to the people of other nations the greater will be the hope for permanent peace.

I want to say to my colleagues in the Democratic Party that when the history of the world is written by the next generation, if there is one man who will have a glorious page in that history for his sincere efforts toward world peace it is your own William Jennings Bryan [applause], and he initiated this very project. That being so it is quite consistent that some of us, who are bending every effort to keep our country from engaging in the race for armament and keeping our country from becoming a militaristic nation, should indorse this project. We see in it not a threatened danger of war but a real agency for bringing the people of the world closer together and, therefore, being a greater agency of peace.

This is the age of great undertakings. After all to what better purpose can we devote our enormous resources than to apply the ingenuity of man of this enlightened day to correcting the defects of nature and thus bringing the people of the world not only closer to each other but also to a better understanding of each other. If the Nicaragua canal will be needed 60 years from now it is our duty to pass this resolution to-day. [Applause.]

Mr. MAPES rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Michigan, a member of the committee, rise?

Mr. MAPES. I desire to oppose the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for five minutes in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SABATH. There was one speech in favor of the amendment and two gentlemen have already spoken against the amendment. I am for the amendment, and I am not entitled to be recognized now?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan, as the Chair understands, rises in opposition to the pro forma amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] and is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SABATH. I was under the impression that the gentleman desired to speak against the original amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan will proceed in order.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I rose to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURTNESS] to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan for that purpose.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen of the committee, I am in favor of the St. Lawrence waterway, but for the life of me I can not see what that has to do with the resolution before the committee to-day. The gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURTNESS], who made the motion to strike out section 2, says that the passage of this resolution will commit Congress to the proposition of building a Nicaraguan canal. In that he differs from the author of the resolution, Senator EDGE, who says that the only purpose of the resolution is to obtain information.

A great many Members seem to think there is something sinister back of this resolution. If there is it does not appear on its face. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER] asked the gentleman from North Dakota what is the cause of it, and the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURTNESS] and others seem to attempt to convey the impression that there is something back of it. The cause of it, the reason for it, is to seek information. Members are justified in scrutinizing every piece of legislation that comes before the House to find out what, if anything, there is back of it. No one can take any exception to that policy; but at the same time they ought not to see things where there is nothing to be seen. This resolution simply provides that Army and civilian engineers shall examine these two routes and make a report back to Congress of what they find. That is all there is to it. No stretch of the imagination can find anything else in it. The author of the resolution in the Senate, Senator EDGE, says:

The joint resolution provides simply and alone for information. It does not establish any policy at all.

In that statement he differs from the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURTNESS]:

It provides that Congress and the country shall be informed through an investigation to be made by the Board of Engineers as to the practicability and feasibility of taking advantage of the right of way which we purchased from the Government of Nicaragua to construct an interoceanic canal across the Isthmus at that point; likewise, to be given all information as to the feasibility and practicability of increasing the facilities of the Panama Canal. It has been suggested that it might be possible to install a third set of locks at Panama and thus increase the facilities of the Panama Canal approximately one-third.

Now, dismissing these bugaboos that some people have in their minds, all the resolution proposes to do is to authorize the engineers to survey the situation and make a report so that the Congress and the country will know what the situation is.

Mr. RAMSEYER and Mr. SABATH rose.

Mr. MAPES. I am sorry, but I have not the time to yield.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I want to ask a pertinent question for information.

Mr. MAPES. I am sorry, but I have not the time to yield.

The question has been asked, What is the need of this survey; what is the need of additional canal facilities at the Isthmus? And there have been some answers here to the effect that it will be 60 years before there will be any necessity for additional canal facilities at the Isthmus.

Gentlemen who make such statements are undoubtedly sincere. They make them in good faith and believe them to be true, but such statements should be understood for what they are. They are merely expressions of opinion and not statements of fact. There are great differences of opinion about the present facilities of the canal being sufficient even 10 years from now. As Senator EDGE well said in his speech on this resolution in the Senate, "Estimates, of course, are nothing but guesswork," and the traffic in the Panama Canal has doubled in every 5-year cycle since it was opened.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAPES. For the first 5 years it was a certain amount, the next 5 years it was twice as much as it was the first 5, the next 5 years it was twice what it was the preceding 5, and so on.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I am sorry, but I have not the time.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. It is right on that point.

Mr. MAPES. I quote from the speech of Senator EDGE. I am sorry I have not the time to yield, I will say to the gentleman.

We can not visualize commercial traffic for 5 or 10 or 15 or 20 years—

Said Senator EDGE.

What sounder proposition was ever made?

We can not visualize commercial traffic for 5 or 10 or 15 or 20 years. The fact remains that in each cycle of five years since the canal has been operating, the traffic has more than doubled. * * * It is coming along with such rapidity that surely there can not be any reasonable objection to getting all the information in order to be prepared for a final decision on the part of Congress as to our future canal policy. That is all this joint resolution does.

That is the statement of the proponent of the resolution, Senator EDGE. Let me quote the Senator from Tennessee, Senator MCKELLAR, who refers to a statement by his colleague, Senator KENDRICK, of Wyoming. Senator MCKELLAR, speaking of the conditions and about the need of this survey and of additional canal facilities, says:

The Senator from Wyoming, Mr. KENDRICK, is exactly right when he says that the Panama Canal will be used to its utmost limit of capacity in six or seven years.

See how widely opinions differ as to the capacity of the canal at present to take care of the future needs? Senator MCKELLAR and Senator KENDRICK say that it will be used to its utmost capacity in six or seven years. Senator MCKELLAR continued:

It will be but a very short time until that happens; and it is absolutely necessary that something should be done at once to provide increased canal facilities.

Now that is the situation. This resolution simply provides for a survey and for a report on the two propositions.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I trust the gentleman will not make that motion until I have an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. I may want to talk some myself.

Mr. PARKER. I will amend the motion in order to allow the gentleman to have five minutes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I shall claim recognition in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PARKER] moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I expressed my views on this bill last night and had not intended to say anything more.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] has fallen into a gross error with reference to the rate of increase in the use of the Panama Canal. I hold in my hand the report of the Senate committee on this bill. It carries a table on the use of the canal which I assume comes from some reliable source, and I read it, as follows:

Fiscal year ending June 30—	Number of transits	Panama Canal net tonnage	Tolls	Tons of cargo
1915	1,075	3,792,572	$4,367,550.19	4,888,454
1916	758	2,396,162	2,408,089.62	3,094,114
1917	1,803	5,798,557	5,627,463.05	7,058,563
1918	2,069	6,574,073	6,438,853.15	7,582,031
1919	2,024	6,124,990	6,172,828.59	6,916,621
1920	2,478	8,546,044	8,513,933.15	9,374,499
1921	2,892	11,415,876	11,276,889.91	11,599,214
1922	2,736	11,417,459	11,197,832.41	10,834,910
1923	3,967	18,605,786	17,508,414.85	19,567,875
1924	5,230	26,148,878	24,290,963.54	26,994,710
1925	4,673	22,855,151	21,400,523.51	23,958,836
1926	5,197	24,774,591	22,931,055.98	26,037,448
1927	5,475	26,227,815	24,228,830.11	27,748,215

It purports to give us the business of the canal for every year since 1915. It plainly shows that there has been little increase in the use of the canal since 1924. There was a falling off in 1925 and 1926 below the amount of 1924. In 1927 the use of the canal again came up until it slightly exceeded the use of 1924.

Now, I want to say further, this: We do not object to any investigation gentlemen may want to make with reference to the Panama Canal, and its enlargement. The amendment of the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURTNESS] contemplates merely striking out the reference to the Nicaragua end of the proposition. That is what we want to eliminate.

Let us consider the matter like sensible men. We are appropriating here $150,000 and have provided that with that sum an investigation shall be made of the Nicaraguan route, of the San Blas route, and also of the Panama route. That sum is probably not sufficient to pay more than one-tenth of the cost of all that work. It is not sufficient to do what is required to be done at Panama alone. It will take a matter of five years and probably more to complete the entire three investigations included in this bill. If we should confine this bill to Panama alone, that money and more could be spent in the Panama investigation, and yet the investigation will not have been completed by the time Congress assembles again and probably not for a year or two thereafter. There will be plenty of time in which to pass a measure and to make new appropriations for the San Blas and the Nicaraguan routes.

These two projects are an unnecessary part and do not belong in the bill. Therefore I say as I stated last night that we can not escape the conclusion that there is "a bug under the chip," and that the full purpose of the bill has not been disclosed. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] twitted me that I was "too suspicious," that I was looking for something sinister in everything. Let me say to him that "a burnt child dreads the fire." I was not born yesterday. I have been misled before, and therefore I am afraid. I advise every Member of the House if they want to act advisedly on this measure to get more information before they act. Ask some one to tell you why the Nicaraguan route was put into this bill. I asked it last night. I challenged the chairman of the committee, and every Member who advocated the bill to give a single reason for the haste with which they were pressing it forward. I got no answer, nothing but silence. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired; all time has expired, and the question is on the amendment of the gentleman from North Dakota.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BURTNESS) there were 50 ayes and 110 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. The President is hereby requested to report to the Congress not later than two years from the approval of this resolution the results of the investigations and surveys hereby authorized, together with such recommendations in connection therewith as he may deem advisable.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The proponents of this resolution have placed it before you, but have refused to give you any information. I took the trouble to send a radiogram to the American Governor of the Panama Canal Zone, and I would appreciate the attention of the House to the reading of his reply. The following is the radiogram received a few minutes ago from the Governor of the Panama Canal Zone. It is addressed to me; in reply to a radiogram I sent yesterday for information as to the facilities of the Panama Canal. This radiogram was received at 2 p. m. to-day, and was sent from Balboa Heights, Panama Canal, March 1, 1929:

Making all allowances such as for locks overhaul periods, present capacity of the Panama Canal is 60,000,000 tons per year. Traffic last year was something less than 30,000,000 tons. According to best estimate that is now possible the growth of traffic will not exceed 10,000,000 tons per decade, which indicates third set of locks will be required in about 30 years, but to construct in such manner as to cause minimum interference with traffic their construction should be undertaken at least 10 years before actually required. I have stated that constant study should be made by the canal administration of growth of traffic in order that Congress may be informed in ample time to provide for construction of third set of locks. The present water supply is sufficient to operate existing locks, although for more satisfactory navigation Alhajuela Reservoir should be completed as soon as possible. Congress has already authorized beginning of this work, but appropriations have been small. Subsequent to completion of this reservoir water supply will be ample for third set of locks, giving Panama Canal traffic capacity of 100,000,000 tons per year.

BURGESS.

FRIDAY—11 a. m.

One hundred million tons is over three times the traffic needs at the present time, and, further, in spite of all that Senator EDGE has said, according to the reading of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD here to-day, the Governor of the Canal Zone says that with three locks the facilities of the Panama Canal will be sufficient for 70 years to come. I join with the others who are asking and demanding without response why should this legislation be rushed in at the eleventh hour, and why should we be asked to authorize a survey of the Nicaraguan canal, when the Governor of the Panama Canal Zone, a man who has been the chief engineer there for four years, says that the Panama Canal can take care of all requirements for 30 years and with an additional lock for 30 more years?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Who is that signed by?

Mr. FISH. It is signed by Burgess, who is the Governor of the Panama Canal Zone, and who was formerly chief engineer for years on the Panama Canal.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

The question is on the committee substitute for the Senate resolution.

The committee substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the committee will now rise.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MICHENER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration Senate Joint Resolution 117, pursuant to House Resolution 345, and he reported the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the resolution as amended be agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the third reading of the Senate joint resolution.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion to recommit, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. RAYBURN moves to recommit S. J. Res. 117 to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce with instructions to report the same back with the following amendment:

Strike out all of section 2, and "for the operation of a canal across Nicaragua or elsewhere and," on lines 5 and 6 of page 6.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

Mr. BURTNESS. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. As many as favor ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Thirty-seven Members have risen, not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RAYBURN) there were—ayes 56, noes 185.

So the motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the resolution pass?

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

The title was amended.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Connecticut yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. I understand that we are about to take a recess until 8 o'clock. What business will be taken up at the night session?

Mr. TILSON. Conference reports and other privileged matters.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I think the House ought to be informed that I shall endeavor to call up the conference report upon H. R. 349, the naturalization bill.

Mr. BEEDY. Do I understand that bridge bills are going to be brought up this evening?

The SPEAKER. The session to-night will be a regular business session of the House.

RECESS

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House stand in recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.) the House stood in recess.

EVENING SESSION

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker.

LOUIS C. CRAMTON,
JOSEPH W. BYRNS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order on the conference report. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. WOOD. I yield.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Of course, we do not have the report before us and all we can get is from the reading of the statement. Is there any instance in which the conferees have put into this report or dealt with anything in this report that was not in dispute between the two bodies?

Mr. WOOD. There is not.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think it is well for that statement to go in the RECORD. I withdraw the reservation of a point of order.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I wish to say to the House that the conferees having under consideration the first and second deficiency bills are in complete agreement, for which we are very thankful and I presume every Member of this House is very grateful.

The statement that has just been read to you is with reference to the second deficiency act.

There are no items in dispute in so far as the first deficiency bill is concerned. The first deficiency bill, under the parliamentary situation in which we find ourselves, has to be presented first to the Senate, while on the other hand we are to present the conference report on the second deficiency bill first to the House.

There are three or four important items that attracted more or less attention while these measures were under consideration in the House. Foremost, I expect, was the prohibition item.

I am glad to inform you that we are in complete agreement with reference to this item and I am pleased that the conferees on behalf of the Senate receded and accepted the proposition proposed by the House. [Applause.]

This is divided, however, in the first and second deficiency bills. In the first deficiency bill we have placed all that we put in the second bill for prohibition enforcement amounting to one million and some odd hundred thousand dollars. The other items with reference to an increase for the Department of Justice, for the Customs Service, and for the civil service are in the second deficiency bill or the one that has just been reported. In all, we have appropriated for prohibition enforcement in round numbers $2,750,000.

I wish to say in this connection that an item of $200,000 was proposed in the Senate, and adopted, for the enforcement of the narcotic law. This was agreed to by the conferees on behalf of the House.

Thus you will see how we have divided the amount of money that was suggested by the estimates that came from the Treasury Department with reference to prohibition enforcement.

There is another item that I wish to call to your attention where we found ourselves absolutely unable to reach an agreement and that was with reference to the limitation that was put upon the second deficiency bill concerning the salaries of the civil service employees in the District of Columbia.

The conferees representing the Senate would not yield and would not recede in the opposition of the Senate to the limitation placed on the bill as it passed the House and went over to the Senate. The so-called Brookhart amendment that was substituted in the Senate on the second deficiency bill was absolutely impossible so far as the conferees on behalf of the House were concerned, and the Senate having knocked out the House proposition, we together knocked out the Senate proposition and the matter is just as it was before either the Senate or the House acted upon it; and while it is unfortunate that there has been no legislation at this session of the Congress curing the ills that are manifest in the civil-service salaries of the District, I believe we have done the best thing possible in rejecting not only the proposal of the Senate but perhaps in not agreeing to the proposal of the House, because this will eventuate, I trust, in a just and equitable salary law coming as a matter of legislation from the committee whose business it is to propose such a law.

I can not agree to the proposal in the Brookhart amendment. I do not believe there is anyone acquainted with the facts that can subscribe to it. I do not believe there is any Member of this House or of the Senate, knowing the facts as they exist and can be made plain to everyone who wishes to inform himself, who believes that this Congress ever intended that any employee of this Government should jump two or three grades at once, raising in many instances, if you please, their salaries as much as $2,000 and some as high as $2,500. More than 2,800 of the civil-service employees have been benefited in the higher grades, while those in the lower grades have been benefited but a trifle.

We all believed, as was stated here time and time again, when the so-called Welch bill was passed, that we were enacting it for the purpose of helping the members of the clerical forces who were illy paid and none of us believed and none of us ever intended that instead of helping them but a trifle that we should increase by one-third, in many instances, the salaries of those in the higher brackets.

So that I say in regard to those who have the ill-gotten gains—and I measure my words—that legislation should be had to reduce the status in which they have been placed to that the Congress intended they should occupy, and at the same time those may receive the benefit intended for them, and I hope this legislation may be had at the earliest opportunity.

This committee has been assailed, has been besieged by those who were recipients of the large salaries. We have been told that unless they are allowed to remain we will lose in various departments many scientific, learned, and highly paid gentlemen who will go out into other fields. It is a wonder that they did not lose many of them from heart failure when they became conscious that the increase was made under this interpretation. [Laughter.] We are now in the condition that we were before your committee attempted to do anything with reference to the salary list of the civil service.

These are the two most important items in the report. There is another item that many are interested in, and that is the reconstruction of the two vessels—Virginia and Pennsylvania. An authorization was had a short time ago for the reconditioning of these two vessels, carrying an authorized appropriation of $14,800,000. No estimates came in. It appeared that it was the part of economy to the United States to recondition these vessels immediately. We have conditioned six heretofore, and in order that they might recondition them economically and not make too great a strain on the Treasury at one time we have appropriated one-half of the allocation.

In this case we have provided that the allocation should be equal between the two vessels in reconditioning. These are among the prime items of importance in this bill that will come over to-night.

Mr. EDWARDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. I yield.

Mr. EDWARDS. The $6,000,000 for the storm sufferers is included in the bill?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. You have not reached any agreement as to the increase in salaries—that is still in controversy?

Mr. WOOD. No; it is not, as far as we are concerned. The Senate knocked out the proposal made by the House, and the conferees rejected the proposal made by the Senate. So neither is in either bill.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. How much is the amount for reconditioning the vessels?

Mr. WOOD. $7,400,000.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. How soon is the reconditioning to begin?

Mr. WOOD. As soon as the vessels now on the ways are taken off; about the 1st of July next.

Mr. LINTHICUM. What became of my little item for Lucy Knox?

Mr. WOOD. That went the way of the whangdoodle. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. I yield.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The gentleman stated how much was in the bill for prohibition enforcement?

Mr. WOOD. You will see that the item carried in the joint bill provided for $250,000 for the survey to be made. As proposed in the Senate it was to inquire into the violation of the prohibition laws and stopped at that. But in order that there might be a full and intelligent survey, made not only of the violation of the prohibition law but the violation of all laws, we enlarged the language so as to make it apply to the investigation of all law violations.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The item in regard to the rural sanitation is in the bill?

Mr. WOOD. Yes. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM].

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen of the House, I take the floor to comment briefly on that portion of this conference report which has eliminated all prospect of any correction of the glaring defects and inequalities that the Congress about a year ago forced upon the Government employees. If any Member of the House thought that we were passing legislation that would benefit the poorer-paid employees when we passed the Welch bill, then he just deliberately and blindly shut his eyes and stopped up his ears, and did not carefully consider what he was voting on. The Welch bill as originally introduced by the gentleman from California [Mr. WELCH] was designed to aid the lower-paid employees, and it would have cost the Government around $90,000,000 a year.

We all remember very well that great army of clerks and employees who came to Capitol Hill to evince their interest in this legislation, and many of us were enthusiastic because we hoped the time had come when we would be able to do something in a material way for this great army of underpaid clerks and employees of the Government. But what happened? The legislation was submitted not to the legislative branch of the Government, but to the executive branch of the Government, and the Director of the Budget started in to cut off some of the necessary funds to pay for this legislation. Of course, instead of cutting it off from the higher-paid employees, he cut if off from the lower-salaried employees, and we passed a legislative monstrosity, under which, after the Comptroller General had put the finishing touches on it, we found we had increased the salaries of a group of higher-paid Government officials anywhere from $1,500 a year to $2,500 a year, and the clerks receiving around $1,100 or $1,200 or $1,500 were given $120 a year increase, or sometimes only $60 a year.

This Congress was importuned to pass corrective legislation, and the gentleman from New Jersey, the chairman of the Civil Service Committee, Mr. LEHLBACH, introduced a very splendid bill, known as the Lehlbach bill. In the first place, the Lehlbach bill undertook to call upon the Personnel Classification Board to reallocate those higher-paid salaries, and to take the money out of the pockets of those officials who had appropriated the fund illegally, and unlawfully to their own salaries, and reallocate it and give the lower-paid employees an increase. That was a righteous provision, and the House incorporated that provision in the deficiency appropriation bill when we passed it the other day. In the next place, the gentleman from New Jersey incorporated in his bill certain provisions which would have insured additional raises in salaries of the lower-paid employees.

But again the executive branch of the Government stepped in and showed its hand, and the gentleman from New Jersey reintroduced his bill, and when the new bill was reintroduced he cut out all reference to a reduction of the higher-paid employees, and the ultimatum came down to this end of Pennsylvania Avenue from other end of Pennsylvania Avenue that there would be no pay legislation if Congress undertook to reduce the salaries of any of the higher-paid employees, and the House of Representatives, doing in this instance just as it has done in the instance of the retirement legislation, hauled down its flag and abdicated in favor of the executive branch of the Government. And there will be no legislation this Congress in the interest of the lower-paid Federal employees.

What has happened in this bill? In the deficiency appropriation bill the House has incorporated a provision demanding that these higher-paid employees disgorge, that they give up these salaries that they have unlawfully appropriated to themselves and that this money be parcelled out to the lower-paid employees. The Senate at the other end of the Capitol incorporated a provision that would have given a raise to the lower-paid employees.

I do not criticize our conferees. I am sure that they had a tremendous task to perform, and there were many important and necessary items in this bill that could not be prejudiced. However, the conferees on the part of the Senate and House got into a room and had a boxing match, and the House kicked out the Senate provisions and the Senate kicked out the House provision, and now we come down to the end, and the gavel will fall on the 4th of March with the same confusion and chaos in the ranks of the Goverment employees that existed a year ago, and it will keep on doing that until the House of Representatives stops long enough in the earlier days of one of its sessions to give sane, careful consideration to this great problem. And what must we do? We must have a complete survey of the whole Federal pay roll and take the time to sit down and work it out, and stop legislating for groups and classes.

We raise this group and the next group comes in for a raise, and then another group comes in for a raise. Some of you may be astounded when I tell you to-night that there is not a Federal department now that can tell you within 10,000 or 15,000 or 20,000 how many employees there are of this Federal Government. There is not a department that knows that. Everybody has guessed about it and Congress has been guessing about it.

I know it is too late in the session to pass any kind of constructive legislation on this point. My only thought in taking your time to-night when you are busy and want to get to other affairs is to register a protest in order that when we come back again in another legislative session we may give to this matter of readjusting Federal salaries careful consideration, and take time and have patience and try to mete out some measure of justice to the men and women in the departments who are working on small salaries, and, if you please, who are the warp and woof of this Government. [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I asked the chairman of the Appropriations Committee in charge of the bill [Mr. WOOD], what had become of the little item for Mrs. Lucy B. Knox. He said it had gone the way of the whangdoodle. I do not know what a whangdoodle is, but I want to take the time to protest against the fact that this item was not included in either the first nor second deficiency bill by the House Appropriations Committee.

It is a matter which I think should be considered at this time. Mrs. Lucy B. Knox is the widow of Lieut. Commander Forney Moore Knox, who died in the interim between the time the law was supposed to be repealed by the war risk insurance act and its reenactment June 4, 1920. If Commander Knox had lived four months longer his widow would have received at once a half year's salary of $2,370.

I brought the matter before the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Sixty-ninth Congress. They reported the bill favorably. It was passed by this House. It went to the Senate, but was lost in committee. I went before the Committee on Naval Affairs again at the last session. It was reported favorably again, and passed this House April 20, 1928. It went over to the Senate and passed the Senate, and was signed by the President. An estimate was sent down to the Appropriations Committee at this session. And yet in spite of the fact that the bill had passed this House on two occasions and had passed the Senate and was signed by the President and an estimate had been sent down to the Committee on Appropriations the Committee on Appropriations of the House has absolutely ignored it. In the Senate they put it in the first deficiency bill, and they put it in the second deficiency bill, and yet the conference committee on this side opposed the Senate amendment, so it was omitted.

Now, the question I want to bring before you is just this: Has this House no voice in the appropriation of the people's money when such appropriation has been considered and authorized by Congress? Has the Appropriation Committee grown so great that it can so ignore legislation? Are we to sit idly by and have the Committee on Appropriations ignore us? Was it not their duty to appropriate?

I asked the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations—the gentleman and I are perfectly good friends—why it was, and he said he did not know, but that he did not believe in it. I said to him, "The Senate and the House have both passed it." He said, "Yes; we have even to correct the actions of the House of Representatives on some occasions."

As I understand, it was tacitly understood that this Committee on Appropriations when created, as I understood and when I voted for its establishment, would appropriate for the things we authorized to be paid. Yet the committee by its act says concerning this little widow (who is working for her living), while other widows of men who died in the naval service are receiving their money, that she can not get her half-year salary because her husband died before a certain day of the reenactment. I asked the chairman why not insert the appropriation? He replied, "Because it would set a dangerous precedent." I wrote to the chairman of the committee and also the conferees and quoted them four separate precedents on all-fours with this, and yet they refused.

I think this is a matter worthy of being called to the attention of the House, and I am going to insist that Mrs. Lucy B. Knox be given the money to which she is entitled. I have just begun to fight. [Applause.]

[Extract from Naval Affairs Committee report]

Commander Forney Moore Knox died during a lapse in the law; that is, between the time that it was held to have been repealed by the war risk insurance act and the time it was reenacted, June 4, 1920.

The purpose of this bill is to authorize payment to Lucy B. Knox of six months' pay at the rate received by her husband, the late Lieut. Commander Forney Moore Knox, United States Navy, at the time of his death. The records show that this officer died at Annapolis, Md., on February 16, 1920, as the result of pneumonia.

The act approved May 13, 1908, which was repealed by the act of October 6, 1917, provided for the payment to the beneficiary of an officer or enlisted man of the Navy or Marine Corps, who died as the result of wounds or disease contracted in the line of duty, of an amount equal to six months' pay at the rate received by the officer or enlisted man concerned at the date of his death. This provision of law was reenacted under the act of June 4, 1920, but at the time of Lieutenant Commander Knox's death, there was no law in effect which authorized the payment of the gratuity in question to his widow.

Had Lieutenant Commander Knox's death occurred on or after June 4, 1920, his widow would have been entitled to six months' pay at the rate received by her late husband at the time of his death. However, the date of this officer's death precludes payment of the gratuity to his widow under the law.

The Navy Department has consistently recommended general legislation, but the committee is of the opinion that these cases should be taken care of as they are presented by the individuals. In the Sixty-seventh Congress legislation was enacted granting six months' pay to the following persons: Harriet B. Castle, private law 273; Alice P. Dewey, private law 255; Josephine Barin, private law 242; Ellen McNamara, private law 222.

* * * * * * *

The Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1406) granting six months' pay to Lucy B. Knox, having had the same under consideration, report favorably thereon, without amendment, and with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

When the war risk insurance act was passed it was held that the act granting six months' pay to the widow of an officer who died in the service was repealed. This seemingly was not the intent of the Congress as they again in the act of June 4, 1920, reenacted in substance the former law which gave to the widow six months' pay upon the death of her husband. That law is as follows:

"That hereafter, immediately upon official notification of the death from wounds or disease, not the result of his own or her own misconduct, of any officer, enlisted man, or nurse on the active list of the regular Navy or regular Marine Corps, or on the retired list when on active duty, the Paymaster General of the Navy shall cause to be paid to the widow, and if there be no widow to the child or children, and if there be no widow or child, to any other dependent relative of said officer, enlisted man, or nurse previously designated by him or her an amount equal to six months' pay at the rate received by such officer, enlisted man, or nurse at the date of his or her death. The Secretary of the Navy shall establish regulations requiring each officer and enlisted man or nurse having no wife or child to designate the proper dependent relative to whom this amount shall be paid in case of his or her death. Said amount shall be paid from funds appropriated for the "Pay of the Navy" and "Pay of the Marine Corps," respectively.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 349) to supplement the naturalization laws, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The House bill changes the method of making proof of residence and good moral character by petitioners for naturalization. The Senate amendment strikes out the House text and inserts a number of provisions relating to naturalization. These are:

(1) The provisions of the House bill are substantially reinserted with a few clerical amendments. To these clerical amendments the House agrees with further clerical amendments.

(2) It is provided, in the case of petitions heard after the enactment of the act, that the five years' continuous residence required for naturalization purposes shall be presumed to have been broken by return to the country of the alien's allegiance, and remaining there for more than six months but less than one year, such presumption to be overcome on showing of reasonable cause for not returning sooner. Absence for a continued period of one year or more conclusively breaks the continuity of residence. The House agrees to this provision.

(3) Another provision extends the privilege of naturalization of alien seamen serving three years on board merchant or fishing vessels of the United States of more than 20 tons burden, so as to include service on all vessels of more than 20 tons burden which are not foreign vessels, the principal classes thus included being yachts and certain harbor boats. The Senate amendment also adds a clarifying provision to the existing law relating to the naturalization of members of the military and naval forces and seamen. The House agrees to these provisions.

(4) The Senate amendment also authorizes the making, upon payment of a fee of $20, of a record at ports of entry in the case of an alien in whose case there is no record of admission for permanent residence, if the alien shows to the satisfaction of the Commissioner General of Immigration that he entered the United States prior to July 1, 1924, has resided here continuously since the date of his entry, is a person of good moral character, and is not subject to deportation. The record thus made may be used as a basis for issuance of the certificate of arrival required by the naturalization laws to be attached to the petition for citizenship. For the purposes of the immigration and naturalization laws, an alien for whom a record of registry has been made is deemed to have been lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence as of the date of his entry. The House agrees to these provisions, with an amendment limiting their application to aliens who entered the United States prior to June 3, 1921.

(5) The Senate amendment also provides that declarations of intention made after 60 days after the passage of the act shall not be valid until a certificate of arrival has been issued and the lawful entry of the alien for permanent residence has been established. The House agrees to this provision with an amendment making the effective date July 1, 1929.

(6) The House also agrees to the provisions of the Senate amendment establishing a fee of $5 for all certificates of arrival, raising the fee for declarations of intention from $1 to $5, and the fee for certificates of citizenship from $4 to $10, and to a provision relating to the method of accounting for fees received by clerks of Federal courts in naturalization proceedings.

(7) The Senate amendment also provides for the issuance by the Commissioner of Naturalization of duplicate certificates of citizenship and declarations of intention where the original is lost, mutilated, or destroyed. A fee of $10 is provided. The House agrees to this provision.

(8) The House also agrees to a Senate provision authorizing the Commissioner of Naturalization to issue, upon payment of a fee of $10, to any naturalized citizen a special certificate of citizenship for use by the citizen only for the purpose of obtaining recognition as a United States citizen by the country of his former allegiance.

(9) The Senate amendment also authorizes the Commissioner of Naturalization to issue a certificate of citizenship to any individual over 21 years of age claiming to have derived United States citizenship through the naturalization of a parent or husband, or by birth in a foreign country of an American father, upon payment of a fee of $10 and the taking of an oath of allegiance. The certificate can not be granted unless the individual is within the United States. The amendment further provides that the certificate of citizenship thus issued shall be conclusive evidence of citizenship, and provides for penalties for offenses in connection with the certificate and its issuance. The House agrees to these provisions with two amendments, first taking out the language which authorized the issuance of certificates to persons deriving citizenship by birth in a foreign country of an American father, and, secondly, providing that the certificate instead of being conclusive evidence, shall have the same effect as a certificate of citizenship issued by a court having naturalization jurisdiction.

(10) The House agrees to provisions of the Senate amendment requiring an applicant for first or final citizenship papers to furnish two photographs of himself for identification purposes, and directing the Commissioner of Naturalization to make studies and furnish statistical information that will show the relation by nationalities of aliens heretofore seeking citizenship to the numbers of annually arriving aliens and to the census of foreign-born populations.

The action of the House conferees as above indicated is subject to the further condition that the taking effect of the act shall be postponed to July 1, 1929, except the section of the Senate amendment authorizing appropriation of the sums necessary to carry out the act.

ALBERT JOHNSON,
BIRD J. VINCENT,
GEO. J. SCHNEIDER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House——

Mr. BOX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. With pleasure.

Mr. BOX. What arrangement will the gentleman be able to make as to time?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. My desire is to make a statement of about 10 minutes, roughly outlining the bill and then yield to the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Illinois, members of the committee, between them about 25 minutes.

Mr. BOX. I thought the gentleman from Texas was to have 20 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I think that is about right. I would like to make as brief a statement as I can as to the necessity for the major part of this legislation.

This has been a great problem in the naturalization office, the Department of Labor, and in Congress for many years. In the old days it was the so-called nunc pro tunc process. For years many efforts were made to put riders on bills to take care of a situation that seemed unhandleable.

If you will examine the naturalization law of June 29, 1906, made at a time when the Immigration Service was not a great bureau, you will find that the naturalization provision in the first paragraph provided that the Bureau of Naturalization, under the direction and control of the Secretary, shall have charge of all matters concerning naturalization of aliens, and that it shall be the duty of the Bureau of Immigration to do certain things. What? To provide for the use of the various immigration stations throughout the United States books and records wherein the Commissioner of Immigration shall cause a registry to be made in the case of each alien arriving in the United States, personal description, and so forth, intended place of residence, and the date of arrival of said alien, and if entered through a port, the name of vessel in which he came; and it shall be the duty of said Commissioner of Immigration to cause to be granted to such alien a certificate of such registry with the particulars thereof.

In thousands and thousands of cases this was not done.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Is that not now the law?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That naturalization law is in effect.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Then, why bring out a new bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am not bringing up a new one. I am explaining why this bill (H. R. 349) is necessary, for the reason that many persons who were entitled to receive certificates of entry from the United States Government never received them. That is the whole point.

Mr. O'CONNELL. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. For five years no record was made at the American points of entry along the Canadian border. Inspection of aliens was made at Montreal, Halifax, Vancouver, and other Canadian ports, but the law required a record to be made at the American ports of entry, such as Seattle, Buffalo, Detroit, Portal, N. Dak., and other places.

Probably the largest number of beneficiaries under the act we are now about to agree to will be due to this failure of recording. The parents and friends of many who came here are now dead. Children from other countries can not tell you how they came, because the United States did not keep a record, although the law I have read calls for that record.

That was, in part, the situation when the temporary quota law was passed limiting the number and making exceptions for visitors for pleasure. The quota law was passed June 3, 1921. This conference report calls for the use of that date on which the officers may on proper inquiry issue a certificate of entry to the alien domiciled prior to June 3, 1921, and who at the time of the application can show good conduct. With a certificate of entry, and then proceed to citizenship in the course of time, and must, of course, prove good conduct.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The gentleman is referring to the people in this country?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In the United States.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. And we can not put them out on account of the statute of limitations?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I should have mentioned that.

Mr. CELLER. There is nothing in the act involving compulsory registration?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No; nothing at all. Persons who have been here five years can not be deported except for a few crimes. The people to which this bill refers have been here since 1921 and can not be deported. Those that came between 1921 and July, 1924, are not included in this bill. There was great pressure to bring it down to that date, but the House conferees thought otherwise. Persons who have been here, coming prior to July 1, 1924, will not be deportable after the coming 4th of July.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Can they get citizenship papers?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. What proof does the applicant have to make?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It will be by affidavit and inquiry, just as now.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. If there is no record of his entry, how can he prove it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. He will have to prove his actual presence by affidavit.

Now, a further feature of this report is that many paid their head tax and some did not pay their head tax. Those who receive a certificate of entry will pay $20. Many have already paid the head tax. It was smaller many years ago but is now $8.

Another feature of the bill is as soon as this goes into effect the total fees of all naturalization will be $20. The whole process for all, whether the record can not be shown to be true up to 21 or not—the whole fee is $5. I think that is quite right. In Canada the naturalization fees are $25. In England, $40; in Switzerland more than $25.

Now, the other features of the bill have to do with administration, making up the records of naturalization, which you will find highly valuable.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Box].

Mr. BOX. A prominent American journal recently said of my work in this House and on this committee that I believe that "the way to restrict immigration is to restrict immigration." I accept that as a correct interpretation and a compliment. The only objection which the antirestrictionists have to this bill is that it does not go far enough in the direction in which they want to go. The objection which restrictionists have to this bill is that it is a long move in a direction backward from the restrictionist standpoint, seriously impairing the naturalization laws, making a serious breach in the immigration laws, and preparing the way for further backward movements on both these lines.

The main provisions of this bill have never been before this House. They consist of the Copeland amendment, added by the Senate to the harmless and helpful provisions of the Vincent bill (H. R. 349), correcting some minor weaknesses in naturalization procedure. The Schneider bill (H. R. 13793), reported by the House committee in the absence of the chairman by a divided vote, carried some of the provisions of this measure, but some of the safeguards which the objectionable Schneider bill carried were, of course, eliminated by the Copeland amendment, and some entirely new and bad things were embodied in the Copeland amendment not included in the Schneider bill (H. R. 13793).

The conferees are in this report handing the restrictionists of the House a "package" the like of which neither the House committee nor any conference committee have before called upon them to accept during my service in this House. While handing us this gas bomb the conferees and the other body have taken away the mask which our denatured deportation bill was designed to furnish. The history of our deportation bills will be interesting to restrictionists of this House and the country and will throw light upon the situation which presents such a proposition as this to the House and the country.

During the Sixty-ninth Congress your committee expended great labor on a deportation bill, which it reported to the House and which the House, upon mature consideration, passed by a large majority. That bill went to the Senate and was never passed.

During the first session of this, the Seventieth Congress, your committee reported a somewhat modified edition of the deportation bill, which had already passed this House during the former Congress, but that second edition remained asleep on the calendar. After the purpose to bring forth some such measure as this fully developed, the chairman hurriedly threw together some matter on deportation which the committee hastily considered and which the House hastily passed. That bill contained much that was good, but having received immature consideration was in some of its parts subject to just criticism. The bill was as a rider placed on a Senate bill and went to conference. But it is pretty safe to say that it has been or will be either emasculated or killed. What is left of it is too much out of line with this bill for both to survive. For instance, it provided that an alien who was smuggled into the country could be fined and imprisoned, while this bill proposes to give vast numbers of such people the privileges and responsibilities of American citizenship and allows them to bring in great numbers of nonquota relatives, which they can not now do.

Time will not permit me to discuss all of the bad things contained in this bill, but one of them is found in subdivisions (c), (d), and (e) of section 6, the last of which provides for the repeal of section 10 of the naturalization act of 1906, as amended, and section 2170 of the Revised Statutes. The latter section provides that—

> No alien shall be admitted to become a citizen who has not for a continued term of five years next preceding his admission resided within the United States.

The law now permits an alien seaman employed in the Navy of the United States or on any vessel of United States registry or enrollment to become naturalized after a service of three years, without proof of any residence within the territorial limits of the United States. This law was probably enacted in an effort to Americanize aliens in the Navy and merchant marine of the country, but the privilege went to none but such as were employed on vessels of United States registry. That limitation is removed by this delightful measure, so that harbor boats and yachts have to keep their alien crews only three years before they can have them become American citizens. An alien on shore among the body of the people must stay five years. Under the former law an alien in the service of our Navy or merchant marine had that time shortened to three years.

Now it is proposed that the harbor boats and private yachts of more than 20 tons burden may fill their crews with aliens and have them remain on these vessels, without contact with Americanizing influences, and yet become citizens within three years. There are several hundred rich Americans with yachts whose alien employees would come within this class. It is nice for them to hire cheap alien seamen in various capacities on their yachts, and it is very important that you restrictionists from the interior should hasten to give them that privilege

Then there are considerable numbers of rum runners which are not enrolled or registered as American vessels. It will help their business if you will give their alien seamen citizenship quicker than you do an alien who is living among you.

Besides, there are a great many harbor boats in our larger seaports which are not enrolled or registered as American vessels. Some of them are said to be engaged in the business of smuggling aliens into the United States. Of course, it will help their business for you to give their alien seamen citizenship within three years, though I have no reason to believe that it will be better for the citizenship to have that done. But you will understand that all of the alien seamen who thus get American citizenship within three years will have the privilege of bringing certain relatives into the country as non-quota immigrants. If they have filed declaration of intention they will get citizenship and bring their nonquota relatives sooner. This, of course, is exactly in line with the whole tenor and purpose of the Copeland amendment to this bill. I shall discuss some other features of it in connection with the main body of the bill.

Under the long-established policy pursuant to which our naturalization laws have been written and maintained aliens who smuggle themselves into the country in violation of the immigration laws have been denied the right to become citizens, the privilege of reentering the country upon going out, and the favor accorded to citizens and aliens lawfully in the country of having certain near relatives admitted as immigrants, either by preference within the quota or as nonquota immigrants. The Copeland amendment to H. R. 349, as presented in this conference report, proposes to reverse that policy as to all aliens who came into the country illegally prior to June 3, 1921, and as to all who, entering prior to that date, have illegally remained in the country since then in violation of their obligation to depart upon expiration of the term of their temporary admission.

It proposes that many thousands of aliens who entered the United States prior to June 3, 1921, in contempt of law and those who have unlawfully remained while under obligation to depart shall have their illegal entry or stay validated by certificate of arrival upon making some showing in an ex parte proceeding before subordinates of the Immigration Service in the field that such alien—

(1) Entered the United States prior to June 3, 1921;

(2) Has resided continuously in the United States since such entry;

(3) Is a person of good moral character; and

(4) Is not subject to deportation.

There is no requirement that he shall have entered the country without any intent to violate the law; no restriction that the immigration officers shall find that he is such a person as should now be admitted under the law, or that he could have been admitted had he properly applied for admission as an immigrant. Both of these provisions were consciously and intentionally omitted because they would have barred the hundreds of thousands of guilty aliens and their relatives now in Europe, to whom this bill caters.

The House committee bill, reported by a divided vote, required that it be shown that such person has behaved as a person of good moral character at all times since entry, but that was changed in the Copeland amendment and in the conference report so as to merely show that he is of a good moral character now. Nearly anybody can make that statement in an ex parte affidavit if no questions are to be asked about his past.

The provision that such aliens shall not be subject to deportation has little restrictive effect because deportation proceedings against nearly all such are already barred by the statutes of limitations. The conference report contains no requirement that the alien shall show that he entered the United States legally; that he has rightfully remained within the United States; or that he was admissible under the law at the time of his entry, or that his illegal entry or stay was without intent to violate the law. The policy heretofore maintained in excluding him from citizenship and from other privileges recognizes the sound principle that wrongful intent is presumed from the alien's conscious action.

The chief purpose of the Copeland amendment and this conference report is not to provide a nunc pro tunc showing of lawful entry heretofore made. Its chief purpose is to pardon and reward the illegal entry of all who smuggled themselves into the United States prior to June 3, 1921, and all who have illegally remained after the expiration of the period of their temporary visits.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. I can not. I am very sorry.

Another class specifically designed to receive this pardon and reward consists of deserting seamen who entered prior to the date named under obligation to depart upon expiration of their shore leave. There are many thousands of these.

This bill will have a direct and substantial effect (1) in giving the ballot to hundreds of thousands not worthy of it and not equal to its responsibilities, and (2) in heavily increasing the volume of our immigration.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. I can not yield.

To help you appreciate the situation with which you are dealing I call your attention to the fact that under our present law, unimpaired by such serious breaches as this will be, we are receiving at least three times as many aliens as the quota numbers. The present quota is about 164,000 per year, but it does not apply to all classes nor all countries, nor to temporary visitors. While we are telling the country that we have reduced the immigration quotas to 2 per cent, based on the census of 1890, and that the quotas are about 164,000 plus, we are in fact receiving of all classes about 500,000; but these large numbers do not include deserting seamen, aliens who smuggled themselves into the country, and others whom this bill will favor.

As indicating a part of this situation, I call your attention to the testimony of Assistant Secretary of Labor Robe Carl White, given January 12, 1926, as reported in Immigration Committee hearings, Sixty-ninth Congress, first session, page 172:

Mr. SABATH. What is the gentleman going to quote from?

Mr. BOX. I am going to quote from the hearings before the Committee on Immigration, the testimony of Mr. White, Assistant Secretary of Labor. Mr. Golder asked him:

Mr. GOLDER. Did I understand you to say, in your judgment there are about 250,000 aliens now in the United States deportable under the existing laws?

Mr. ROBE CARL WHITE. That is the judgment of the district directors, in all of the districts, which meets with my approval. I believe they are conservative in that.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. When was that?

Mr. BOX. That was in 1926, on the 12th of January.

We have been deporting 11,000 to 12,000 aliens per year, at which rate we are deporting about one-twentieth of those subject to deportation.

In an article in the Congressional Digest of May, 1928, at page 151, Commissioner General Hull said:

We have many aliens who are unlawfully in the United States. Various estimates have been made as to the number, some running as high as 3,000,000. Regardless of the number, the problem presented is enormous, and the danger to our institutions is real. These aliens illegally in the country are divided into several classes—those illegally here because at the time of their entry they were not entitled to enter the United States, which include those entering surreptitiously; those securing entry by means of false and misleading statements; and those who arrived as seamen and deserted their vessels or were discharged at the port of arrival and abandoned their calling; and those who were originally lawfully admitted, but have since become public charges, or have been sentenced for the commission of one or more crimes involving moral turpitude, or have done other things in violation of our hospitality.

Among many other bad things about the conference report it gives the privilege of reentering to the hosts of its beneficiaries though the majority of them have entered illegally; it gives them the privilege of becoming citizens and confers on them the privilege of bringing a host of near relatives as nonquota immigrants. The extent of the injury done, of course, depends in part upon the number to be pardoned and naturalized and the number of new immigrants to be brought in under the legislation. A little less than five years after June 3, 1921, Commissioner General Hull testified as follows:

Mr. HULL. * * * Now, you apply that on through the number of aliens that we know are in the country, and you can make a rough guess and it will run you over 1,300,000. That, probably, is too many, but it may be right. It may be less; we do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. That would apply to all the people who are here and unable to prove legal entry into the United States?

Mr. HULL. And the payment of the head tax and inspection.

Mr. BOX. That is all prior to June 3, 1921?

Mr. HULL. They came in before June 3, 1921. (Hearings January 12, 1926, p. 31; committee hearings, 69th Cong., 1st sess., p. 179.)

He further testified that the department estimated that 250,000 more had at that time entered since June 3, 1921, but they are in a separate class and if I have time I shall show you how they are benefited under this bill and the legislation which they expect to get enacted hereafter, but this bill deals directly with the 1,300,000, more or less, designated in Commissioner Hull's testimony. Nobody knows the exact number to be benefited under this particular measure, but everybody acquainted with the subject knows that the number runs into many hundreds of thousands, and the Commissioner General of Immigration has approximated it at 1,300,000.

The bulk of these have not been examined to ascertain whether or not they have criminal records; whether they are mentally, morally, and physically inferior; whether they have met the requirements of the literacy test; whether they entered as contract laborers, and whether they have met the standards of our immigration laws as set up in the act of 1917. It is known that the bulk of them came in defiance of law. I submit that a proposition to admit them to citizenship now is a ruinous impairment of our standards of immigration and naturalization.

As bearing upon the practices of the country before alien and hyphenated influence became so powerful with politicians and Congress, I quote from annual reports made by the United States Commissioner of Naturalization dealing with the subject of naturalization and citizenship:

In his annual report for the fiscal year 1923–24, at page 11, the Commissioner of Naturalization said:

The following recommendations are strongly urged:

At the present time an alien may declare his intention to become a citizen immediately upon landing in the United States, regardless of lawful entry therein or of his ability to read, speak, or write the English language. No alien who entered the United States unlawfully should be allowed to declare his intention, particularly if he entered since May 1, 1917, the date the immigration act of February 5, 1917, became operative. * * *

On page 12 of the same report the commissioner said:

Since the recent quota law became effective an applicant who is a nonimmigrant alien and not an "immigrant" as defined in section 3 of the act of May 26, 1924, can not have residence in the United States for naturalization purposes, because he can not show admission to the United States as an immigrant alien upon an immigration visa. Such an alien should not be entitled to obtain a certificate of arrival from the manifest upon which he is recorded as entering the United States nor become naturalized. * * *

In his annual report for the fiscal year 1924–25, page 7, the Commissioner of Naturalization said:

It was early revealed in connection with the investigations under this requirement that large numbers of aliens who had entered the country illegally or who were unlawfully remaining in the United States after having entered the country for temporary periods of residence only were attempting to make declarations of intention.

Under the plan adopted by the bureau, applications from aliens arriving after June 30, are compared with the immigration visas in the custody of the Bureau of Naturalization. This requirement, it is believed, laid the foundation, at least at this point in the administration of the naturalization law, for the defeat of the attempts to become citizens by those who entered the United States in defiance of the provisions of the quota and visa restrictions of the immigration law. * * *

On page 8 of the same report, in dealing with the great number of temporary visitors who have remained in the country illegally, the Commissioner of Naturalization said:

This close cooperative action has resulted in the apprehension of many aliens temporarily in the United States who have attempted to make the declaration of intention and thereby acquire seeming rights under which to maintain permanent residence in the United States. * * *

There are reported to be in the country innumerable aliens who have entered the United States since June 3, 1921, in defiance of the immigration laws. Many of the declarations of intention now in existence will be found to be in the hands of such illegally entering aliens at the time the 5-year period of residence for naturalization purposes has expired. * * *

In addition to these, alien seamen under the La Follette law were entitled to leave their ships on arrival at American ports and seek employment in their vocation, under certain restrictions, prior to July 1, 1924, when a visa became a prerequisite to permanent lawful presence in the United States. In some cases the masters of the vessels made no report to the immigration officers, but evidently permitted the seamen to leave in all respects regularly except as to the immigration requirements. In others, seamen left their vessels without any formalities being observed. In numbers of instances these aliens shipped in pursuit of their calling, some upon foreign-bound vessels of American or foreign registry, others on coastwise vessels, while others remained permanently ashore, taking up land vocations. Some had paid the immigration head tax, others had not. These various classes represent many thousands of aliens whose status in the United States it is difficult, if not absolutely impossible, to determine.

In his annual report for the fiscal year 1925–26, at page 16, the Commissioner of Naturalization said:

* * * Evidence is conclusive of aliens arriving in the United States in disregard of law during the period of the quota law and since the operation of the immigration act of 1924. Many have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States who have no lawful right to make such declaration, because they are in this country in defiance of the immigration laws relating to the quota and immigration visa requirements.

In his annual report for the fiscal year 1926–27, at page 10, the Commissioner of Naturalization said:

The first quota restriction law became operative on June 3, 1921. From reports, official and otherwise, it is common knowledge that there have been many aliens who have entered the United States illegally since that time. Large numbers of them have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States. As a reward for their violation of the law they are now in possession of declarations of intention not possible of attainment by other aliens not admitted to the United States lawfully.

This bill, as amended by the Copeland amendment and as presented in the conference report, ignores the difference between law-abiding immigrants and bootlegged aliens, and rewards disregard of the law. It throws citizenship and its privileges, including the ballot, into the dirt at the feet of aliens who have despised the laws and are most apt to be without capacity to appreciate or use the ballot.

As to how this bill will increase immigration during the next few years, I submit that it will do it—

First through the admission of an increased number of nonquota immigrants. Beginning a few months after the passage of this bill, these hundreds of thousands of smuggled-in aliens being pardoned and rewarded by this bill will begin to become naturalized citizens. That is one of the major rewards being paid them for their contempt of the law. After becoming naturalized citizens, each one of them will be entitled to have admitted as nonquota immigrants the classes mentioned in subdivision (a) of section 4 of the immigration act of 1924, to wit, his wife and unmarried minor children. The number of such nonquota immigrants is very great, and the number of such coming to the hundreds of thousands benefiting by this bill will be large, and——

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. I regret that I can not.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The gentleman is stating his own views, and we can construe this measure in another way.

Mr. BOX. I did not yield to the gentleman, but the gentleman from Texas is not misconstruing this measure.

Second, they will be entitled to readmission under subdivision (b) of section 4 of the immigration act of 1924 when returning from a temporary visit abroad, from the very date of the beginning of the administration of this act, if passed. Every one of such who goes out can, after paying for the certificate provided for, get a permit to reenter simply because he had theretofore illegally entered. Entering thus illegally, he thereby becomes entitled to reenter; and every one who thus reenters, who could not otherwise do so, will be an addition to our alien population. Generally those favored by this bill will be the most objectionable part of the country's alien people. All of the increase thus provided under subdivisions (a) and (b) of section 4 will be nonquota, or outside the quota, immigrants and, of course, will add to the volume of our immigration to the extent of their numbers, which will be large.

In addition to the numbers that will come outside the quota will be those entitled to a preference within the quota. Under the present law the number of immigrants entitled to a preference within the quota is so large as to congest many consulates. In some countries the waiting list now extends 10 to 20 years ahead. Under the Jenkins Act, itself unobjectionable, all of the relatives of the classes named in that act of aliens lawfully admitted to the country are entitled to a preferred status within the quota. This bill will transfer some hundreds of thousands of smuggled-in aliens into the class of those legally admitted, and thus give their relatives of the classes named the preference status provided for such relatives in the Jenkins Act. This will further congest our consulates, and will be a rank injustice to naturalized citizens and aliens lawfully admitted and their relatives in thus giving to the smuggled-in aliens and their relatives a share in the privilege of having their relatives admitted, which under the present law belongs only to citizens or aliens lawfully admitted to the country. This is unwise and wrong.

Mr. Speaker, this is not an overstatement, and if you gentlemen see proper to take a view different from that I express to you, and that on this lack of information and immature consideration, I ask you to calmly examine this measure hereafter and see whether or not I am warranted in the statements that I make. I ask you at the same time to watch the immigration figures jump up after the passage of this bill, as soon as it has time to get in full operation.

It is the intention of those promoting this legislation, in and out of Congress, that this policy shall go forward. The Copeland amendment, passed by the Senate, provided that this date should be July 1, 1924, where June 3, 1921, now appears; and a majority of the conferees wanted that date fixed, but the chairman of the House committee was able to prevent the adoption of that date. It has been openly and repeatedly declared—I may safely say that it has been definitely determined—that at an early session of Congress this date will be brought forward to July 1, 1924.

Even when that date was yet in the Senate amendment alien and hyphenated influences, some chambers of commerce and others were protesting that the date should be brought down to now; so that while we were pardoning this 1,300,000, more or less, we should also pardon the several hundred thousand who came in thereafter up to the present in defiance of law.

When you pass this measure you will have no sound reason on which to base a refusal to pass future measures like it, so that under such a policy the many thousands who got into the country illegally, avoiding all of our wholesome immigration restrictions, can be received into the body of our citizenship and can forthwith bring their relatives as nonquota immigrants. Gentlemen, you should not pass this measure. It makes a serious breach in our immigration and naturalization laws and adopts a policy which will continue this hurtful course to still worse consequences.

Among other objectionable features of the Copeland amendment and this conference report is the preparation for a great increase in the Naturalization Bureau, with the furnishing of a great many new Federal jobs and the piling up of further bureau expenses. My information and my judgment are that the enactment of this law will soon require that the personnel of the present Naturalization Bureau be soon increased to twice its present number.

For years I and other members of the committee have been coming before this House and before the Committee on Appropriations asking for larger appropriations for the Immigration Service in order to better patrol the borders and to deport those for whose deportation the law provides. Again and again your committee has learned that the present force at the command of the Immigration Service is utterly inadequate. I have just called your attention to the testimony of Assistant Secretary of Labor White there were in 1926 at least 250,000 deportable aliens in the country, while our deportations rarely reached 12,000 in number, which is less than 1 in 20 of those who ought to be deported. Now, this bill proposes that these forces which have been inadequate for the work of protecting the borders against the smuggling in of immigrants and unequal to the work of deporting any considerable portion of our bad aliens, is to be diverted from that work and put to the task of making some sort of a formal field investigation of this 1,300,000, more or less, illegally in the country in order to grant them immunity and give them citizenship. They can not do such work adequately. It is a farce to pretend that they can do it. It is much like providing that the constables or other petty officers in the outlying portions of the county shall adjudicate land suits or try other important civil or criminal cases. To ask that this work be done by the field representatives of the Immigration Service is ridiculous. It means just what the whole bill means—that the law is to be cheapened and impaired and its enforcement, already deplorably bad, made much worse.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mrs. KAHN). The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BOX. I have done the best I could. I wish I could tell you all that is in this bill and the extent to which it contradicts the professions of those who call themselves restrictionists but nevertheless join in this reversal of provisions of our naturalization laws and impairment of important restrictons of our immigraton laws. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Madam Speaker, I hope all will understand that aliens here prior to June 3, 1921, are here and a large number of them for the reasons stated before, the failure to keep a record of entry into the United States. Now, there was a record kept for quite a long time when applications were being made for nunc pro tunc process. In the years 1923 and 1924, after the passage of the temporary quota act, the record was between 6,000 and 7,000 alien declarants, and at that time the declarations of intention averaged 300,000 a year. To me it is a most interesting thing that in all the days following the great immigration to the United States, when it ran more than 1,000,000 a year, that the declarations of intention did not reach higher numbers, and that actual citizenship papers were issued to so few.

The present naturalization law has been in effect 23 years. In the records there are approximately 5,000,000 declarations of intention. Now, do not think I am saying that means that many are to come up. That is what we have had as to declarations of intention for 23 years, and out of that 5,000,000, 3,500,000 in the 23 years' time made petitions for naturalization and about 3,000,000 certificates of naturalization. Remember, that is in 23 years' time.

For years, as I said, efforts were made in every way possible to find some way to cure the nunc pro tunc, which is illegal, and to provide a way by law. I am not alarmed. I am as satisfied as can be, my friends, that we must have a dead line. You will remember that in the 1924 immigration restriction act the burden of proof is always on the alien, not on the United States, and if he enters surreptitiously he is deportable for all time. It is necessary to find a dead line somewhere, and that is what we are trying to do.

Madam Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington moves the previous question on the conference report.

Mr. BOX. Madam Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. Does the gentleman want the yeas and nays on the previous question?

Mr. BOX. No; not on the previous question. I thank the gentleman for his correction.

The question was taken; and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is now on the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. BOX. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks for the yeas and nays. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Fifty-two gentlemen have arisen, not a sufficient number, 58 being the required number.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Madam Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman from Texas, as I understood it, demanded the yeas and nays and Madam Speaker counted those rising in favor of having the vote by the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Fifty-two.

Mr. BANKHEAD. And how many were present?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Two hundred and eighty-seven Members were present at the last count. Fifty-eight would have been a sufficient number.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I make the point of order, there is not a quorum present.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRISP. As the Speaker well knows, the Constitution of the United States provides that one-fifth of the Members present have the right to have the yeas and nays. There has not been a roll call or any count of the House, so far as I know, since we convened at 8 o'clock. On a request here for the yeas and nays, 52 rose. The Chair stated that that was not one-fifth of those present, and when the other side was asked to be counted to see if 52 was one-fifth of those present, the Chair did not count, and, therefore, I appeal to the Speaker. Under the Constitution, one-fifth of those present in the House being entitled to the yeas and nays, I asked the Speaker to ascertain if 52 is not one-fifth of those present in the House.

The SPEAKER. The present occupant of the chair announced not very long ago, after having carefully counted, that 287 Members were present. The Chair assumes there are still 287 Members present. So there was not a sufficient number. Now, a point of order is made that a quorum is not present. The Chair will count.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Just a moment, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make the point of order there is no quorum present?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I withdraw that point and ask for the other side on the demand for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has before him this precedent:

Such count (meaning such count as the present occupant of the chair made long since) is not subject to verification and a request for a rising vote of those opposed to the demand is not in order.

Now, if the gentleman makes the point of order there is not a quorum present, the Chair will be delighted to count.

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; I withdraw that.

Mr. BOYLAN. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GREEN. As much time has elapsed since the first count was taken and as the other side of the question was not put, is it not in order to request the Chair to again put the question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair, as he said before, if anybody makes a point of order there is no quorum present, will count. Now, does any body make such a point?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, to relieve any question here, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER (after counting). Three hundred and ten Members present, a quorum, and the conference report is agreed to.

Mr. BOX. Has the question ever been put in any way on the conference report, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What is the present parliamentary situation?

The SPEAKER. The parliamentary situation is that the conference report is agreed to so far as the Chair knows.

Mr. BANKHEAD. We ask for a division on that question.

The SPEAKER. A division is in order.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 218, noes 110.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Speaker, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. JOHNSON of Washington and Mr. BOX.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 154, noes 89.

So the conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Washington, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

ENTRY OF ALIENS INTO THE UNITED STATES

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (S. 5094) making it a felony, with penalty, for certain aliens to enter the United States of America under certain conditions in violation of law; and ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 5094) making it a felony with penalty for certain aliens to enter the United States of America under certain conditions in violation of law having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the House amendment insert the following:

"That (a) if any alien has been arrested and deported in pursuance of law, he shall be excluded from admission to the United States whether such deportation took place before or after the enactment of this act, and if he enters or attempts to enter the United States after the expiration of 60 days after the enactment of this act, he shall be guilty of a felony and upon conviction thereof shall, unless a different penalty is otherwise expressly provided by law, be punished by imprisonment for not more than two years or by a fine of not more than $1,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

"(b) For the purposes of this section any alien ordered deported (whether before or after the enactment of this act) who has left the United States shall be considered to have been deported in pursuance of law, irrespective of the source from which the expenses of his transportation were defrayed or of the place to which he departed.

"(c) An alien subject to exclusion from admission to the United States under this section who is employed upon a vessel arriving in the United States shall not be entitled to any of the landing privileges allowed by law to seamen.

"(d) So much of section 3 of the immigration act of 1917 (U. S. C., title 8, sec. 136(j)) as reads as follows: 'persons who have been deported under any of the provisions of this act, and who may again seek admission within one year from the date of such deportation unless prior to their reembarkation at a foreign port or their attempt to be admitted from foreign contiguous territory the Secretary of Labor shall have consented to their reapplying for admission' is amended to read as follows: 'persons who have been excluded from admission and deported in pursuance of law, and who may again seek admission within one year from the date of such deportation, unless prior to their reembarkation at a place outside the United States or their attempt to be admitted from foreign contiguous territory the Secretary of Labor has consented to their reapplying for admission.'

"(e) So much of section 18 of the immigration act of 1917 (U. S. C., title 8, sec. 154), as reads as follows: 'or knowingly to bring to the United States at any time within one year from the date of deportation any alien rejected or arrested and deported under any provision of this act, unless prior to reembarkation the Secretary of Labor has consented that such alien shall reapply for admission, as required by section 3 hereof,' is amended to read as follows: 'or knowingly to bring to the United States any alien excluded or arrested and deported under any provision of law until such time as such alien may be lawfully entitled to reapply for admission to the United States.' The amendment made by this subsection shall take effect on the expiration of 60 days after the enactment of this act, but the provision amended shall remain in force for the collection of any fine incurred before the effective date of such amendment.

"SEC. 2. Any alien who hereafter enters the United States at any time or place other than as designated by immigration officials or eludes examination or inspection by immigration officials, or obtains entry to the United States by a willfully false or misleading representation or the willful concealment of a material fact, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and, upon conviction, shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year or by a fine of not more than $1,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

"SEC. 3. An alien sentenced to imprisonment shall not be deported under any provision of law until after the termination of the imprisonment. For the purposes of this section the imprisonment shall be considered as terminated upon the release of the alien from confinement, whether or not he is subject to rearrest or further confinement in respect of the same offense.

"SEC. 4. Upon the final conviction of any alien of any offense under this act in any court of record it shall be the duty of the clerk of the court to notify the Secretary of Labor, giving the name of the alien convicted, the nature of the offense of which convicted, the sentence imposed, and, if imprisoned, the place of imprisonment, and, if known, the place of birth of such alien, his nationality, and the time when and place where he entered the United States.

"SEC. 5. Terms defined in the immigration act of 1924 shall, when used in this act, have the meaning assigned to such terms in that act."

And the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendment to the title of the bill.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 5094) making it a felony with penalty for certain aliens to enter the United States of America under certain conditions in violation of law, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The Senate bill made it a felony for any alien who has been arrested and deported under the immigration act of 1917 or the immigration act of 1924 to enter the United States in violation of law and provided that he should be deported at the expiration of his sentence. It further provided that the clerk of the court, upon the conviction of the alien, should notify the Secretary of Labor and also notify the marshal having the prisoner in custody who should retain the prisoner for not more than five days to enable the Secretary of Labor to arrest him for deportation. The House amendment strikes out the Senate text and reinserts it with certain perfecting amendments to which the Senate agrees. Under the provisions of the bill as agreed to in conference, if an alien has been arrested and deported he is excluded from admission to the United States and hence becomes deportable under section 19 of the immigration act of 1917.

The House amendment also added nine new grounds for deportation, together with certain provisions depending upon these deportation provisions. Under the bill, as agreed to in conference, all this matter is omitted.

The House amendment also added a section making it a criminal offense for an alien to enter the United States without inspection or at any time or place other than as designated by immigration officials, or to obtain entry by willfully false or willfully misleading representations or willfully concealment of material facts. The Senate agrees to this provision.

The House amendment also added a section having the effect of permitting deportation immediately upon the release of a criminal on parole if he is otherwise deportable. The Senate agrees to this provision.

The House amendment amended the title of the Senate bill, and the House recedes from this amendment.

ALBERT JOHNSON,
BIRD J. VINCENT,
GEO. J. SCHNEIDER,
A. J. SABATH,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I recognize that some people feel that it is easy to criticize. I am of the opinion that most of the times it is easier to approve and praise than to be obliged to point out the shortcomings and defects as I am from time to time obliged to do on the floor of the House.

The bill under consideration, however, proves beyond doubt that honest criticism is helpful and beneficial. We have now before us a bill which I am pleased I can support and vote for, because the conferees, after I had pointed out to them the many harsh, inhumane, and retroactive provisions, agreed to eliminate them, and now we have a bill that will punish real offenders and not merely unfortunates.

I only regret that my provision and amendment which aimed for the deportation of the vicious gun gangs has not been agreed to. However, I recognize that not one in a thousand of that class is an alien; but I was desirous of securing the passage of that provision more for the purpose of closing the mouths of those who continually yell and who continually are trying to unload the crime wave upon the alien, notwithstanding that in their hearts they know that these charges are false and untrue and are being repeated by them deliberately and willfully so as to create prejudice against the immigrant or the alien in the minds of the American people.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak on H. R. 349, the so-called naturalization relief bill, which the chairman of the committee and many others are trying to make you and the country really believe that it is a relief bill.

I concede that it will make possible for some aliens who have entered the United States before July 1, 1921, and of whom there was no record made at the ports of entry, to offer evidence to prove that they have actually entered legally and secure the rights and privileges of becoming American citizens, after, however, complying with all the naturalization laws which, however, this act materially not only strengthens but will make rather expensive.

Now what does the bill really do? It provides, in the first place, that a man who can prove that he (1) entered the United States prior to July 3, 1921, (2) has resided in the United States continuously since such entry, (3) is a person of good moral character, and (4) is not subject to deportation, will receive a registration certificate for which he will be obliged to pay $20 and that because the Government has failed to keep records of his entry.

After that, under section 4, which provides that upon payment of $5 he will receive, under section 5 of the bill, a certificate of arrival, which, under section 4, is necessary, and which will be required of all aliens in the future, before being permitted to make or file his declaration of intention, and after receiving this certificate, for which he will pay this $5, and not until then can he file his application for declaration of intention for which, instead of $1 as now, he will be obliged to pay another $5. Two years thereafter, if he proves he resided continuously for over two years in the United States, he will have the privilege to file a petition for citizenship and for which he will be charged $10 instead of $4, as under the present law, and if he is found to be entitled to be naturalized, upon payment of another $5, he will receive a certificate of naturalization.

After he has complied with all these requirements and will be naturalized and has received a certificate of naturalization, section 32 provides that, upon payment of $10, he can obtain a copy of his certificate if same is lost or destroyed.

Provision (b) of section 32 gives him the privilege of obtaining a special certificate of citizenship if he desires same to be used when traveling or going abroad, for which he is to pay an additional $10, and this, in addition to the passport that is required of him and for which a fee of $10 is charged by the State Department, but we are not through as yet with all the certificates. There are other certificates to come.

Section 33, to my mind, is the most objectionable of all. That section provides and goes much further, because it does not apply to aliens or to those who are seeking citizenship; but it also applies to approximately 3,000,000 American citizens, who became citizens by act of Congress, through the naturalization of their parents or those who became citizens by marriage before the Cable Act went into effect. And though it is not mandatory for them to obtain a certificate of their citizenship, I feel that this provision will have a tendency to force these approximately 3,000,000 American citizens to comply with this provision and obtain such certificates.

There is no doubt but that the authorities everywhere will demand and require that all naturalized citizens in the United States, including the 3,000,000 citizens made so by the law of the land, prove their citizenship by producing their certificate of citizenship, under this section, and for which they will be taxed $10, saying nothing of the annoyances that it will subject them to.

So, to make the matter clear to all, I insert section 33 and show how far-reaching it is.

SEC. 33. (a) Any individual over 21 years of age who claims to have derived United States citizenship through the naturalization of a parent, or a husband, may, upon the payment of a fee of $10, make application to the Commissioner of Naturalization, accompanied by two photographs of the applicant, for a certificate of citizenship. Upon obtaining a certificate from the Secretary of Labor showing the date, place, and manner of arrival in the United States, upon proof to the satisfaction of the commissioner that the applicant is a citizen and that the alleged citizenship was derived as claimed, and upon taking and subscribing to, before a designated representative of the Bureau of Naturalization within the United States, the oath of allegiance required by the naturalization laws of a petitioner for citizenship such individual shall be furnished a certificate of citizenship by the commissioner, but only if such individual is at the time within the United States. In all courts, tribunals, and public offices of the United States, at home and abroad, of the District of Columbia, and of each State, Territory, or insular possession of the United States, the certificate of citizenship issued under this section shall have the same effect as a certificate of citizenship issued by a court having naturalization jurisdiction.

In addition to this the bill has several other provisions, which, however, to my mind are not of great importance, unless it be section 36, as well as the provision in section 33 which provides that from now on all applicants and all naturalized citizens will be obliged to furnish two photographs of themselves when making an application for citizenship. One of these photographs is to remain part and parcel of the record in the Bureau of Naturalization, which I greatly fear will become a bureau of registration, and from all indications much more stringent than even existed in Russia under the old Czar régime.

To my mind, if this bill is entitled to be called a relief bill it is because it relieves the alien and even the American citizens of several $5 and $10 bills.

These fees, to my mind, are excessive, as now, though we charge only $1 for declarations of intention and $2 for the application and $2 for naturalization, there has been a profit or surplus in that bureau of over $260,000 last year.

Mr. Speaker, it is to be deplored that a great and rich Nation like ours should be guilty of extracting these excessive fees and placing itself in a position as a profiteering Nation.

Instead of this being a relief bill it is a bill that will make in the future the naturalization not only more expensive but much harder to obtain, and notwithstanding the fact that the people responsible for this legislation criticize the immigrant or the alien that they do not become American citizens; or, in other words, first, they make naturalization nearly impossible, and then they charge that they do not care to be naturalized.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I will take three or four minutes to explain this deportation bill, which is a Senate bill. The Senate bill undertook to make it a violation if the person who had been deported returned, and also if certain persons stopped at the gate and attempted to come in without permission. The House by vote added a large number of items, including seven classes. On a careful examination your conferees became convinced that we had not carefully made the distinction between those who should be deported under such conditions and those who might be under other conditions. For instance, if an alien had been in this country five years and one day, and commits a foul murder, he could not be deported under any provisions of the bill passed in this or the other body.

We had certain provisions requiring a deportation for a misdemeanor, a six months' offense. That would apply to "gun toters." The conferees concluded that such things are out of balance.

Mr. HOLADAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. HOLADAY. What aliens can be deported under this bill that can not be deported under the present law?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. All those that return after they have been once deported. The United States goes to great expense in deporting them, and they can come back with another name, perhaps, or come in as sailors and get into the country. The United States stops many at the gate of entry.

Mr. HOLADAY. Any other classes that could be deported?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have not the bill before me. We eliminated the seven classes that were in the bill.

Mr. HOLADAY. I am not interested in what you dropped; but I am interested in what you have in this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. This is a starter, and it is all we were able to get. I believe that it is important to amend the deportation clauses of the law of '17 rather than to undertake to write a new deportation bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. It seems by the support of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], and the answers by the gentleman from Washington, that this is a very innocuous deportation bill. Is the House to understand that in the next session we are to get a real deportation bill? The gentleman's committee has been working on this for six or eight years, and I am surprised to hear that they did not have it in proper form; that they were not able to accomplish anything. I think it is time we had a real deportation bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If the gentlemen will help us, we will have one.

Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BOX].

Mr. BOX. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, the history of deportation legislation during the last two or three years would be interesting to you if you stopped to consider it. During the Sixty-ninth Congress the House passed a substantial deportation bill. It went to the other body but did not pass. It was never acted upon, I think. During the first session of this Congress a milder bill, sort of denatured proposition, was reported in the hope that it might pass. It had too much vigor in it and was too much out of line with the vote here to-night, and could not get consideration in the House. Then as a kind of offset to this measure and, in my judgment, for the purpose of camouflaging the situation and diverting attention from the action on the bill that you have just voted on, a few things were thrown together very immaturely, all of them out of proportion, and brought in here as an offset against this outrageous measure that has just passed. That measure passed. I supported it because it had some good in it. But gentlemen who want deportation will have to understand that the matter must be gone about in earnest by people who want it.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. I regret I can not yield. This last bill that you have just passed provides that it is a felony to do the very thing for which you grant citizenship in the other bill. For having committed a felony you give him the reward of citizenship and the right to bring in hundreds of thousands, perhaps, of his alien kinsmen in the other bill, and say in this one that such a scoundrel shall be guilty of a felony and go to prison as such. When talking about what you are going to do with a man who shall hereafter enter the country illegally, you say you are going to treat him like the felon that he is; but when he and his hyphenated and alien sympathizers are already in the country, most of them illegally, you say he is a good man, entitled to sympathy, and should be given citizenship and the privilege of bringing in his relatives, all of whom, taken together, will amount to many thousands.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

J. H. B. WILDER

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

Ordered, That the House of Representatives be respectfully requested to return to the Senate the bill (S. 5715) entitled "An act for the relief of J. H. B. Wilder."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the Senate?

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia objects, and the Clerk will so inform the Senate.

WILLIAM S. WELCH

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

Ordered, That the House of Representatives be respectfully requested to return to the Senate the bill (S. 2127) entitled "An act for the relief of William S. Welch, trustee of the estate of the Joliet Forge Co., of Joliet, Ill., bankrupt."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request of the Senate will be complied with.

There was no objection.

PILGRIMAGE TO EUROPEAN CEMETERIES

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5332), to enable the mothers and widows of the deceased soldiers, sailors, and marines of the American forces now interred in the cemeteries of Europe to make a pilgrimage to these cemeteries, now on the Speaker's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 5332, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to arrange for pilgrimages to cemeteries in Europe by mothers and widows of members of the military or naval forces of the United States who died in the military or naval service at any time between April 5, 1917, and July 1, 1921, and whose remains are now interred in such cemeteries. Such pilgrimages shall be made at the expense of the United States under the conditions set forth in section 2.

SEC. 2. The conditions under which such pilgrimages may be made are as follows:

(a) Invitations to make the pilgrimages shall be extended in the name of the United States to the mothers and widows for whom the pilgrimages are authorized to be arranged under section 1.

(b) Upon acceptance of the invitation the mother or widow shall be entitled to make one such pilgrimage; but no mother or widow who has previous to the pilgrimage visited cemeteries described in section 1 shall be entitled to make any such pilgrimage, and no mother or widow shall be entitled to make more than one such pilgrimage.

(c) The pilgrimages shall be made at such times during the period from May 1, 1930, to October 31, 1933, as may be designated by the Secretary of War.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following resolution of the Legislature of the State of Montana, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads:

House Joint Resolution 1

A concurrent resolution memorializing Congress to pass and the President to approve at this session House Resolution 14665, by COLTON, as amended

Whereas there is now pending before the Seventieth Congress, second session, House Resolution 14665, by COLTON, as amended, entitled "A bill to amend the act entitled 'An act to provide that the United States shall aid the States in the construction of rural post roads, and for other purposes,' approved July 11, 1916, as amended and supplemented, and for other purposes"; and

Whereas the purpose of said House Resolution 14665 as amended, is to authorize the appropriation, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the construction of main roads through unappropriated or unreserved public lands, nontaxable Indian lands, or other Federal reservations:

The sum of $3,500,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929;

The sum of $3,500,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930;

The sum of $3,500,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1931; and

Whereas the State of Montana has 1,183 miles on 56 routes on their forest highways of which 178 miles are improved, 146 graded, and 858 miles unimproved, the estimated cost of completing the total forest highway system in Montana to a standard adequate for traffic and to compare with State and Federal aid style of construction is $13,418,892, while our present annual appropriation in Montana for forest highway construction is but $350,000; and

Whereas the State highway commission has sufficient revenue to complete the graveling of the uncompleted Federal-aid roads in the State in eight years, but this measure does not contemplate taking in the forestry mileage on that system so at the present rate of appropriations it will take about 30 years to finish the total forestry mileage; and

Whereas a large percentage of this forest highway is in mountainous sections where the construction cost will be from $15,000 to $20,000 per mile and the connections between Montana and Idaho will be particularly costly and take many years to finish; and

Whereas the speedy completion of the forest roads in the Northwestern States is really of national importance and the road situation in western Montana presents exceptional difficulties, the cost of completing the forestry mileage in six counties alone being $7,180,000; and

Whereas the total acreage of the national forests in Montana is 15,919,690 or about 17 per cent of the total area of the State and this territory contains about half of the road-building difficulties in Montana and it is in the northwestern area of Montana that interstate travel is blocked until the Belton-Glacier Road is completed: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Legislature of the State of Montana, the governor concurring, hereby recommends the prompt passage of House Resolution 14665, by COLTON, as amended, at this session of Congress, in order that the construction of roads as therein provided may be undertaken at once, and their completion expedited.

Approved by J. E. Erickson, governor, February 13, 1929.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Montana, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Senate Joint Memorial 7

A resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States requesting the passage of necessary legislation providing for an increase of the tariff on flaxseed and flaxseed products

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States:

Your memorialists, the members of the Twenty-first Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, respectfully request: That—

Whereas flax is one of the important crops of our Northwestern States and is grown quite generally in Montana and to the extent of its planting tends to replace a similar acreage of wheat of which a greater acreage is now planted than is to the best interests of the producers; and

Whereas this country does not now produce a surplus of flaxseed, an increased tariff on this commodity should immediately result in a larger acreage being planted and an improvement in price to the producer together with a measure of relief to the wheat-growing situation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of this Twenty-first Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana that the Congress of the United States place a duty on flaxseed of 1½ cents per pound in lieu of the present rate of 40 cents per bushel of 56 pounds and also a proportionate duty upon flaxseed products; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be transmitted by the secretary of state for Montana to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, to each of the Senators and Representatives of the State of Montana in Congress, also to the Tariff Commission and the Ways and Means Committee of the National Congress with the request that they and each of them exert every effort within their power to bring about the enactment of the tariff legislation herein expressed.

Approved by J. E. Erickson, governor, February 22, 1929.

Mr. BROOKHART presented a memorial of the national executive committee of the Private Soldiers' and Sailors' Legion, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PRIVATE SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' LEGION
OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Washington, D. C., February 26, 1929.

A memorial to the honorable the United States Senate:

The national executive committee of the Private Soldiers' and Sailors' Legion at its annual meeting, held at national headquarters, Washington, D. C., February 22, 1929, adopted the following memorial and directed that it be placed before the Congress with a request that it be given earnest consideration:

In May, 1924, Congress enacted the adjusted compensation act for ex-service men who made up the armed forces of the United States during the World War. This action was a specific acknowledgment that the Government was under financial obligation to these veterans for services loyally and faithfully rendered.

However, in admitting this debt, Congress directed that its payment be deferred for a period of 20 years, with an additional proviso that after two years the holder of an adjusted-compensation certificate might secure a loan representing a fractional part of the face value of the certificate at the time the loan was made.

Records of the United States Veterans' Bureau disclose that under the terms of the adjusted compensation act nearly 3,500,000 certificates have been issued, with a face value of $3,453,142,107.

The Veterans' Bureau has made loans aggregating approximately $100,000,000 to certified holders. It is estimated that probably an equal sum has been loaned on certificates by banks.

The fact that so many certificate holders have been compelled to hypothecate their certificates for small advances indicates so many ex-service men would not, in effect, sacrifice the full benefit of the grant to meet a temporary emergency.

It is probable that in a great majority of instances loans made against certificates will not be repaid, for the good and sufficient reason that the borrowers are not able to liquidate their indebtedness to the Veterans' Bureau and to banks. To the extent that default is made will the intent of Congress be defeated, since a substantial portion of the bonus will be dissipated in interest charges, that will continue until the expiration date of the certificates and be deducted therefrom before payment is made to certificate holders.

The face value of certificates outstanding represents a solemn obligation entered into in good faith by the Government, and it must eventually be paid in full.

It is the deliberate conviction of the Private Soldiers' and Sailors' Legion that the Government, as a duty it owes the national defenders, should at the earliest available date call in these certificates for payment, and we go on record as urging upon Congress the enactment of the necessary legislation to that end.

We take this stand because of the heavy sacrifices that must inevitably confront tens of thousands of ex-soldiers who have borrowed against their certificates and are unable to liquidate their loans. We are also mindful of the necessities of hundreds of thousands of these veterans who need assistance now and not 15 years hence.

Certainly the Government is better able to carry this acknowledged indebtedness than are the ex-service men, the majority of whom have no financial reserves and whose needs are immediate and imperative.

In the settlement of the indebtedness of European governments our Government has been exceedingly generous, deducting from obligations made to us in good faith hundreds of millions of dollars.

Billions of dollars have been advanced to other governments since the armistice, being justified by the desire of our people that other peoples shall be economically restored and enabled to recover from losses sustained during the war.

From the Treasury of our Government have flown out other hundreds of millions of dollars to great corporations, which made enormous profits during the war, the refunds being in large part excess profits made during a period when the ex-service men were serving the Government for $30 a month.

The adjusted compensation was intended to partially compensate these former soldiers for sacrifice they cheerfully made, when noncombatants were receiving enormously high profits and wages for their contributions to the national defense.

Is there any justice in compelling ex-service men to be patient debtors, while others who have less claim on the Government have been, and are being, treated with unwonted generosity?

We think not. On the contrary, we say in all sincerity that the claims of the former soldiers are entitled to prior consideration.

Therefore we earnestly urge that Congress immediately enact legislation directing the Veterans' Bureau to liquidate and cancel all adjusted compensation certificates as rapidly as the Treasury can make the necessary financial arrangements. To this end, we suggest that Treasury certificates, or adjusted compensation bonds in the amount needed, to cancel the entire obligation be authorized by Congress, to be redeemable when and as it is deemed desirable by the Treasury Department.

In offering this memorial to Congress, this organization is speaking in behalf of its entire membership, and also in behalf of millions of former service men who never have been satisfied with the deferred-payment plan, and accepted it reluctantly and protestingly.

Respectfully submitted.

NATIONAL EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE, PRIVATE SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' LEGION,
MARVIN GATES SPERRY, National President,
[SEAL.] G. J. BRESKELL, National Secretary.

Mr. KENDRICK presented the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Wyoming, which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

TWENTIETH LEGISLATURE, STATE OF WYOMING, IN THE SENATE.

Enrolled Joint Memorial 3

An act memorializing the Congress of the United States to make restitution to the State of Wyoming of the moneys heretofore and hereafter to be paid into the reclamation fund by reason of the development of the mineral resources of this State

Be it enacted by the Legislature of the State of Wyoming:

Whereas there has been placed in the reclamation fund under the supervision and direction of the Interior Department of the United States of America in the last 15 years approximately $28,000,000 arising from Federal oil royalties upon petroleum and minerals produced in the State of Wyoming; and

Whereas during the entire lifetime of this State there has been expended in the State on development, construction, and operation for reclamation projects in this State approximately $17,000,000; and

Whereas there is now a great and pressing need for the construction of additional reclamation projects in this State; and

Whereas said reclamation fund has been built up very largely through the depletion of the natural resources of this State, and the said natural resources are being continually and rapidly depleted without any possibility of their replacement or renewal; and

Whereas the amount of money accruing annually to the United States reclamation fund from Wyoming oil royalties is rapidly decreasing year by year to such an extent that the amount of money allocated to the reclamation fund from oil royalties during the year of 1928 was only $1,543,372.49, a fraction of the amount allocated during preceding years; and

Whereas by recently approved plans the Congress of the United States has made possible the construction of an immense irrigation project upon and adjacent to the Colorado River, and has thereby delayed the probability of construction of other new reclamation projects; and

Whereas this State has no funds or means of obtaining funds for the construction of her own irrigation projects unless the Government of the United States can be prevailed upon to return to the State of Wyoming for the construction of irrigation projects within the State its just and equitable share of the moneys heretofore and now being paid to the Federal Government by reason of the development and depletion of the natural resources of the State; and

Whereas the assessed valuation of the State of Wyoming in the 15-year period from 1912 to 1927 increased from $182,028,280 to $461,685,564, or over a quarter of a billion dollars, and said increase in assessed valuation was in a large measure due to the development of industries engaged in mining, producing, and depleting the natural resources of the State and increasing the said reclamation fund herein mentioned; and

Whereas it is the sense of the legislature that the State of Wyoming is rightfully entitled to have returned to it, and spent within its borders on development of reclamation projects, a sum of money equivalent to the amount heretofore paid into said reclamation fund from the development and depletion of our natural resources, and that in equity and justice this State is entitled to the return of such amount of money and the return of all future amounts of money accruing from such sources: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate of the twentieth State legislature (the house of representatives concurring), That the Congress of the United States of America be, and the same is hereby, memorialized as follows, to wit:

By appropriate legislation to return to this State, for the purpose of construction, operation, and maintenance of certain reclamation projects heretofore approved by the engineers of the Reclamation Service, or others that may be hereafter approved, a sum of money equivalent to the difference between the amount heretofore paid into the said reclamation fund by reason of the development of the petroleum industry in this State, and such amount of money as has heretofore been spent on reclamation projects in this State; and that Congress shall agree, by appropriate legislation, to return to this State, for use and expenditure by the proper officials of the State government, all money hereafter accruing to said reclamation fund by reason of such mineral development in and depletion of the natural resources of this State; and be it further

Resolved, That certified copies of this memorial be addressed and sent to Senator FRANCIS E. WARREN, Senator JOHN B. KENDRICK, and Hon. CHARLES E. WINTER, Representative in Congress from the State of Wyoming.

MARVIN L. BISHOP, Jr.,
Speaker of the House.
FRANK O. HORTON,
President of the Senate.

Approved at 10.45 a. m., February 25, 1929.

FRANK C. EMERSON, Governor.

CODIFICATION OF THE NAVIGATION LAWS

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have in my hand, in the form of a bill, a codification of the shipping and navigation laws, which has been prepared by John S. Woodruff, one of the most faithful and industrious men on the Shipping Board. He had this ready some little time ago, but was working on the revision of the laws. He worked day and night on this codification, and I think it had much to do with his untimely death. I desire to have the bill printed, so that it may be available for the public generally during the summer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. JONES introduced a bill (S. 5902) to codify the shipping and navigation laws of the United States, and for other purposes, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

BILL INTRODUCED—MONUMENT TO DANIEL BOONE

Mr. BARKLEY introduced a bill (S. 5903) to provide for the erection of a monument to Daniel Boone and his company of pioneers at Fort Boonesboro, Ky., which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Library.

REPORT ON INDIAN FUNDS (S. DOC. NO. 263)

Mr. FRAZIER. I ask unanimous consent to have printed with an illustration as a Senate document the report of the amount of the funds of Indians, the investment thereof, the rate of interest thereon as of June 30, 1928, together with comments pertinent to the uses made of such funds, which was laid before the Senate on yesterday in a communication from the Comptroller General of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled joint resolution (H. J. Res. 399) providing more economical and improved methods for the publication and distribution of the Code of Laws of the United States and of the District of Columbia, and supplements, and it was signed by the Vice President.

ENTRY OF CERTAIN ALIENS TO THE UNITED STATES

Mr. WAGNER obtained the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a privileged matter that I may call up a conference report concerning which there will be no debate, I assume; and if there is, I will not press it?

Mr. WAGNER. I am willing to yield for that purpose.

Mr. JOHNSON. On yesterday I presented the conference report upon what is called the Blease bill, which was introduced in relation to the immigration law. It is the bill (S. 5094) making it a felony with penalty for certain aliens to enter the United States of America under certain conditions in violation of law. The House has accepted it, and it is now before us. The bill is one presented and approved by the department. I ask that the Senate agree to the conference report.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I hope the Senator can do that a little later in the day. I would like to look into it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very well. May I suggest to the Senator that he will find the conference report in the RECORD of yesterday's proceedings at page 4891. It was presented and printed in order that if any Senator wished to read it he might do so. I shall call it up later in the day.

PRESERVATION OF ORDER IN THE SENATE

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President——

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will my colleague yield for a moment?

Mr. WAGNER. Certainly.

Mr. COPELAND. I was required for eight hours yesterday to observe the rules of the Senate, and one of those rules provides that order shall be maintained. I am going to insist all day to-day and until the close of this Congress that order shall be maintained. I ask the Presiding Officer to be good enough to have Senators take their seats and keep quiet in order that we may hear the proceedings of the business of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order.

CENTENARY OF BIRTH OF CARL SCHURZ

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, thousands were born on March 2, 1829. On the one hundredth anniversary of that day the United States Senate pauses in its deliberations to pay homage to only one of that great multitude—the unforgettable Carl Schurz. Why do we pay this tribute? Why these commemorative exercises? What wonders did this man work that the oldest and the youngest of the great Republics—the United States and Germany—both unite in a common expression to honor his memory?

As I recall the successive episodes of that great career—the war against monarchy, the battle against slavery, the crusade against imperialism, the unremitting fight for civil-service reform, for honest elections, for integrity in public office, for good morals in politics—I cease to wonder that we celebrate this day. Now in retrospect the full size of that great figure looms up out of the past. Another and more subtle question occurs to me: What springs of genius did this extraordinary man tap? What reserves of moral energy did he draw upon that he should have so readily and so rapidly won his way to leadership and made himself the object of the admiration and affection of the American people?

We measure men not only by the heights they reach, but by the handicaps they overcome in the climb. Carl Schurz's greatness signalized by his elevation to the Cabinet, the highest post of honor permitted him under the Constitution, is augmented by the consideration that he started life in a peasant family under an absolute monarchist Government, 3,000 miles from the stage whereon he was destined to play a leading rôle.

It would be a presumption to narrate in this Chamber the story of Carl Schurz's life. It is too well known. The short time that has elapsed since his death has already transmuted that story into legend and given it the dignity of tradition, but it is altogether proper that we should study the meaning and significance of that tradition.

To Carl Schurz America was never a geographic term. He never thought of America as a choice segment of the earth's surface. To him it represented a concept, an ideal land where freedom reigned and opportunity was the heritage of all.

It was on a damp, foggy day in the autumn of 1852 that, sitting on a bench in Hyde Park, Carl Schurz decided to go to America. He had rebelled against the absolutism and the national disunion of his fatherland, and had lost. He had lived the hollow life of the refugee and had wearied of it.

Let me read to you his own words how he came to that decision:

> I felt an irresistible impulse not only to find for myself a well-regulated activity, but also to do something really and truly valuable for the general good. But where, and how? The fatherland was closed to me. England was to me a foreign country, and would always remain so. Where, then? To America, I said to myself. The ideals of which I have dreamed and for which I have fought I shall find there, if not fully realized, but hopefully struggling for full realization. In that struggle I shall perhaps be able to take some part. It is a new world, a free world, a world of great ideas and aims. In that world there is perhaps for me a new home. Where there is liberty there is my fatherland. I formed my resolution on the spot. I would remain only a short time longer in England to make some necessary preparations, and then—off to America!

When he arrived Schurz was in a certain sense a foreigner. In a higher sense he had been a resident of his ideal America ever since his youthful heart had rebelled against the oppression of monarchical government. For his ideal America he had fought in Germany and he wrought for her in France, and thought of her in England, and when he came to the United States he continued to live in that land of his aspirations, the land of freedom and opportunity. When he led his regiment in battle to secure freedom for the black man or reorganized a governmental bureau in order to provide opportunity for the red man; when he counseled sympathy for the war-torn South; when in this very Chamber he insisted that the popular voice expressed in an election must be protected from dishonesty and fraud; when he deserted his party because its presidential candidate was not above suspicion; when he devoted his heart and soul to each of these causes, he was still obeying that same impulse which had sent the young zealot to America in search of fertile lands in which to sow his democratic ideas.

His heart was that of a rebel, his mind that of a constructive statesman. He rebelled against slavery. He rebelled against the spoils system and the party strait-jacket. But he rebelled only when a principle was at stake. Many a man has never deserted his party! Schurz never betrayed his principles!

Schurz, the most distinguished member of the German forty-eighters, brought with him a great quality of which he made a gift to the American people, his practical idealism. He summed up his political philosophy in his own unexcelled phrase:

> My country right or wrong. If right, to be kept right; if wrong, to be set right.

During the dark and trying days when wise men differed how best to bring regeneration to the South, it was well for the United States to have a man high in its counsels who always shifted the ground of debate from partisanship to policy, from expediency to everlasting principle. I make the prediction that history will credit his inspiration with the development of progressive liberalism in this country.

Another aspect in Carl Schurz's record is meaningful not so much for what he did but for what he was permitted to do. No one can underestimate the part which the tolerance and generosity of the American people played in his eventful life. He came from a foreign land a grown man, ignorant of our language and unfamiliar with our institutions. When he knocked we bade him enter and made him welcome. He offered his services and we accepted them, and thereby added another inspiring illustration of America's cardinal institution, that all who wish may join her colors without regard to race or creed or origin. I intend no invidious distinction when I say that it could not have happened under any other flag but ours.

General Schurz, Editor Schurz, Senator, Secretary, to whatever title he bore he brought added distinction. His life was a dramatic poem, his death the swan song of an epoch. We do well to honor him here in this very Chamber, still redolent of his memory, still resonant with his voice.

CARL SCHURZ—LOVER OF LIBERTY

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, of all the gifted men who have come to our shores in the past 100 years none has contributed in such marked degree to the building and upholding of our political ideals as has Carl Schurz—lover of liberty. To no other title has he greater claim, for love of liberty was the motive that guided all his actions. Let Schurz speak for himself:

> Oh, my friends, you can not imagine what electric thrill the word "liberty" sends through the heart of a man whose head is borne down by the leaden weight of oppression. You perhaps have never measured the incalculable value of the treasures you possess. Do not, I implore you, do not jeopardize them in a wanton race of ambition and greediness. Do not, like a spendthrift, squander your noble inheritance, vainly imagining that it is inexhaustible. Liberty is valued most when lost, but then it is too late, and I tell you your institutions do not stand as firmly as the pillars of heaven. You are wielding yet the formidable mace of self-government. Lift it high and throw it down with a crushing blow upon the head of the serpent.

The world first heard of him, a boy of 20, bearing arms in the fight against oppression in 1848 and a little later it thrilled to the story of his daring rescue of his friend Kinkel from the military prison at Spandau. From his exile in England his thoughts turned to America. He revolted at the idea of becoming a professional refugee—Schurz was no parlor liberal—he demanded action—and as his hopes of an immediate revolution in Germany waned, his desire to find a field for his efforts grew. He decided that if he could not become a citizen of a free Germany, he could become a citizen of free America.

At the age of 23, with his young wife of 18, he reached this country September 17, 1852. He wrote his friend Kinkel:

As long as there is no upheaval of affairs in Europe it is my firm resolve to regard this country not as a transient or accidental abode but as the field for my usefulness. * * * I find that the question of liberty is in its essence the same everywhere, however different its form. * * * My interest in the political contests of this country is so strong, so spontaneous, that I am profoundly stirred. More self-control is required for me to keep aloof than to participate in them.

The question of free or slave territory was then entering its last bitter stage, and Schurz firmly believed that not until slavery was abolished in this country would the United States be a world influence in the liberal cause. So with the zest of youth he threw himself into the struggle.

Relatives had preceded him to Wisconsin and it is probably their accounts of its lakes and wooded hills and fertile fields that influenced him to settle at Watertown, Wis., although he made a tour of the country before coming to a decision.

His letters show how intimately he entered into the life of the little town. He was president of an insurance company and had a real-estate business. He became a member of the city council and was appointed commissioner of public improvement, a position which he thought the most important of the municipal offices. The governor appointed him a notary public and he established a German newspaper now edited by one of his disciples, Otto R. Krueger, of Watertown. Mrs. Schurz opened the first kindergarten in the United States and Schurz was made a regent of the State university which a half century later created the Carl Schurz memorial professorship in his honor. The State has further acknowledged its indebtedness by the compilation of a volume of intimate letters, and a biography, written by Dr. Joseph Schafer, superintendent of the State Historical Society of Wisconsin, is in the process of publication. In these volumes may be found much new material that throws a flood of light on Schurz's course as a champion of liberty.

In view of his contacts it is no surprise to find him, in 1856, an active force and a powerful factor among the Germans who had settled in great numbers in the eastern part of the State. His German birth combined with his superior education and qualities of leadership soon made him a great influence in the State and gave him a voice in its affairs. Nor was his influence confined to those of German birth, for he wrote to his friend Kinkel:

A German who, as they declare, speaks English better than they do and also has the advantage over their native politicians of possessing a passable knowledge of European conditions naturally attracts their attention.

Schurz was fully conscious of the possibilities attendant upon his settling in such a community for he confided to his friend:

The German element is powerful in that State and they are striving for political recognition. They only lack leaders who are not bound by the restraints of money getting. There is the place where I can find a sure, gradually expanding field for my work without truckling to the nativistic [Know-Nothing] elements, and there I hope in time to gain influence that may also become useful to our cause. [By "cause" he meant the revolutionary movement in Germany.]

When Schurz made his entry into Wisconsin politics, the Know-Nothing movement was determined to deprive the foreign-born population of any political power, a policy which, naturally, forced the German element to support the Democratic Party. But on the question of free soil the northern and southern Democrats and Know-Nothings split. Schurz believed that the new Republican Party, which opposed the extension of slavery and which was being formed out of fragments of the other parties, could win over to its side many of the free-soil Democrats and it was on that theory and in support of that principle that he gave his whole-hearted support to the election of Frémont. In every community where a group of Germans could be brought together he spoke to them in their own language, and it is largely due to his conversion of thousands of Democrats that the Republican candidate, Frémont, carried the State by a majority of 15,000. In recognition of his efforts he was nominated for the office of lieutenant governor the following year—an honor which he missed by 107 votes. He was further chagrined when he was defeated for the nomination for the governorship in 1859. So were some of the Germans, and they threatened to bolt on the grounds that the Know-Nothings were the cause of his rejection. But in the face of these rebuffs, Schurz was able to see that principle was a bigger thing than personal recognition and urged his friends to stand by the ticket with the result that the Republican candidates, including his opponent, were elected.

The German element was justified in its desire to see Schurz receive the nomination as a reward for his efforts, for, in addition to his earlier efforts in 1858, he had succeeded in winning an election for the first time for the Republican Party in the city of Milwaukee. His campaign was made on an issue against corruption and he thought the election was a triumph of "moral independence over moral servitude, or manhood over servile partisanship." In a speech celebrating the victory he announced the principle that "it is the duty of the citizen to discipline parties by making his support contingent upon their moral rectitude."

In 1860 he was nominated for delegate at large from Wisconsin to the National Republican Convention held in Chicago May 15. As characteristic of him, a week later he wrote Abraham Lincoln:

As a man of honor and faithful to the wishes of my constituents, I stood by Governor Seward for the nomination. If I am able I shall do the work of a hundred men for Abraham Lincoln's election. * * * I shall carry into this struggle all the zeal and ardor and enthusiasm of which my nature is capable.

Since the Republican Party, due to his efforts, had pledged itself in its platform to maintain the rights of foreigners, Schurz had every confidence that the Germans who had been firmly attached to the Democratic party could be won by thousands to the Republican banner. His speeches, prior to this time, had made him known throughout the country as a champion of liberty, and after the convention he began a continuous speaking campaign in New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, and Indiana. His printed speeches were distributed all over the country by hundreds of thousands and he gained for himself the distinction of being called "that tremendous Dutchman."

He had successively brought the city of Milwaukee, the State of Wisconsin, and then the States of the Northwest into the Republican Party; perhaps no one man had contributed more to its growth. Because of that fact he felt under no bond to that party when it deviated from the path of what he thought was right and just. In this connection President Cleveland said of him on a former occasion:

In recognition of the affirmation that ours is a government by party, he did not disparage political organization, or hold himself aloof from party affiliation. He assumed party relationship as an arrangement for united effort in the accomplishment of purposes which his judgment approved; but he never conceded to party allegiance the infallible guidance of political thought, nor the unquestioned dictatorship of political conduct. He believed there was a higher law for both, and the din of party could not deafen his ears to the still small voice of conscience. Thus it happened that when party commands were most imperious and when punishment for party disobedience was most loudly threatened, he defiantly proclaimed under the sanction of conscience, untrammelled political thought and unfettered political action; and thus in the propaganda of political individualism he became a leader, and taught by precept and example the meaning and intent of independent voting.

* * * But no intelligently patriotic citizen can be blind to the fact * * * that the political independence declared and illustrated by Carl Schurz has become a defense and safeguard of the people against the evils that result from the unchallenged growth of irresponsive party management.

Political independence was his virtue. He never regarded a political party as an end. His independence is best expressed in his own words when he said:

As a member of a party I do not cease to be a citizen. Under all circumstances the duties which I owe as a citizen to my country are superior to the duties which I can possibly owe to any party. When I go as a delegate to a party convention, I consult with others as to what may be best for party action. When as a voter I go to the polls, I consult my own conscience about what is best for the country's welfare. And if I conscientiously find that what the party demands is not for the good of the country, then it is not only my right but my duty as a citizen to vote against it.

In this Chamber, while a Member of the Senate, he denounced the imperialistic doctrine of President Grant as "a most absurd, most audacious, and most un-Republican doctrine."

He entreated the Senate and adjured the American people "by the love which they bear to their country, by the inheritance of peace and good government which they desire to leave to their children, and by the hopes of liberty-loving mankind which are centered upon this Republic" to keep our hands off the Republics to the south of us.

I have briefly sketched the life, the influence, and the philosophy of this immigrant boy.

If we were to take a lesson from the life and work of Carl Schurz, we would hear less of the modern Know-Nothing and his empty and sham pretenses.

If this century were to draw from the abundance of Carl Schurz's liberalism, a certain nativistic degeneracy would not seek to deprive America of the infusion of blood from his great race and from other great races of Europe.

Carl Schurz left his indelible impress on the social and political thought of my State. He was our heritage. Wisconsin has been attached to his political philosophy for almost three-quarters of a century. This fact accounts for the early leadership of my State in progressive and liberal thought.

But Schurz had his copatriots, tens of thousands of them of his own blood and other tens of thousands of the blood of other nationalities.

He was a crusader for liberty, a scholar, a patriot, and a philosopher.

He believed the watchword of true patriotism to be, "Our country, when right to be kept right; when wrong to be put right."

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I have here certain conference reports which I desire to present. I first send to the table a conference report, being a complete agreement, on the first deficiency appropriation bill, and move the adoption of the report.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming a question.

Mr. WARREN. I should like first to have the report read, so that Senators may know what it is.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I will have something to say about the report.

The conference report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15848) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and prior fiscal years, to provide urgent supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 12 and 13.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 8, 9, 10, 11, 14, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, and 30, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 7: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 7, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"House Office Building: Toward carrying out the provisions of the act entitled 'An act to provide for the acquisition of a site and the construction thereon of a fireproof office building or buildings for the House of Representatives,' approved January 10, 1929, including not to exceed $900,000 for acquisition of a site, expenses of removal of buildings and other structures located upon the site acquired, printing and binding, and miscellaneous expenses, $2,100,000, to remain available until expended."

ELIZABETH QUINERLY CUMMINGS

Mr. McKELLAR obtained the floor.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. OVERMAN. When the calendar was called last night I could not be here on account of illness, and two bills in which I am interested were objected to by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. He has withdrawn his objection, and I ask unanimous consent that they may be taken up. They will lead to no discussion at all.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, what has become of the conference report that was temporarily laid aside?

Mr. OVERMAN. The consideration of these bills will take but a moment.

Mr. WARREN. Let us take them up in regular order.

Mr. OVERMAN. They could have been passed by this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina?

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 16089) for the relief of Elizabeth Quinerly Cummings was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HUGH DORTCH

Mr. OVERMAN. I now ask for the consideration of House bill 16090.

The bill (H. R. 16090) for the relief of Hugh Dortch was considered as in Committee of the Whole by unanimous consent.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REAPPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES IN CONGRESS

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the bill for the reapportionment of Representatives in the Congress will not be acted upon before the adjournment of the present session of the Congress, but will be before the Senate in the next Congress, I request that correspondence which I have had, containing memoranda on the mathematical aspects of the different methods of reapportionment, submitted by the National Academy of Sciences and Edward B. Huntington, professor of mathematics, Harvard University, be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, in the same connection I ask that my correspondence with Professor Huntington may accompany that submitted by my friend the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CAMBRIDGE, MASS., February 28, 1929.

Hon. ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR VANDENBERG: May I inquire whether you are correctly reported on page 4244 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for Monday, February 25, 1929, where you are quoted as saying that "the advisory committee to the Director of the Census recommends that the system of major fractions be employed"?

The published report of the advisory committee recommends the method of equal proportions.

The published report of the advisory committee was first printed in the Journal of the American Statistical Association for December, 1921, and was reprinted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for April 7, 1926, and in the hearings before the House Committee on the Census for 1927, and in the hearings before the House Committee on the Census for 1928.

This unanimous report was signed by Profs. C. W. Doten, E. F. Gay, W. C. Mitchell, E. R. A. Seligman, A. A. Young, and the late Mr. W. S. Rossiter, and concludes in favor of the method of equal proportions.

On February 21, 1928, Professor Willcox suggested to the House Committee on the Census (hearings, p. 89) that the matter be again considered by the advisory committee, but as far as I know no action was taken by the committee.

If the advisory committee has taken any action which repudiates their published report, should not this fact be made a matter of public record?

Very sincerely yours,

EDWARD V. HUNTINGTON,
Professor of Mechanics, Harvard University.

MARCH 2, 1929.

Prof. EDWARD V. HUNTINGTON,
48 Highland Street, Cambridge, Mass.

MY DEAR PROFESSOR: This will reply to your letter of February 28. I am correctly quoted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for Monday, February 25, 1929. My authority for the statement I made is the following paragraph from a letter dated February 4, 1929, and addressed to me by Professor Willcox: "May I add as confirming your position that last May when the advisory committee to the Director of the Census was in session at the time of the House debate on apportionment, I took the matter up with them and all agreed that in a bill for ministerial apportionment like that now before the Senate, the method of major fractions should be prescribed. Of course, they took no vote, so this statement can not be confirmed in the committee report."

I know that you are in basic disagreement with Professor Willcox as to apportionment methods. But I assume you will consent that I am entitled to rely upon his statements of abstract fact. You will notice in the same debate from which you quote that I subsequently interrupted Senator BLACK and asked him if he would permit me to quote my authority, but he declined. It was my intention at that particular point to do the particular thing which you now suggest, namely, to make this fact a matter of public record.

I am glad that you have read these debates. You will see what has happened. Reapportionment again has been defeated in the Senate. * * * The handiest "excuse" was the academic quarrel over a mathematical method for handling remainders. Thus the tail again has wagged the dog. Based on the 1920 census, the difference between "major fractions" and "equal proportions" involves just 3 seats out of 435. Thus we confront the contemporary spectacle that the mathematical destiny of 3 seats is permitted to overshadow and outrage the constitutional destiny of 432 seats.

I think this situation has been pathetically unfortunate, and I deeply regret that so much artificial emphasis should have been put upon a comparatively minor consideration. * * *

The basic problem is not mathematical at all, but rather it is a problem in correct constitutional interpretations. I take the position that the Constitution intends that equal representation in the Senate shall balance authority as between large States and small States; and by the same token, that authority in the House of Representatives shall be apportioned to population without considering whether this population resides in a large State or in a small State. In other words, I contend as a constitutional axiom that a given individual or group of individuals should have as nearly as may be the same weight in choosing Representatives for the House whether they happen to live in the large States or in the small States. Doctor Willcox declares that the method of major fractions is the only method in the long run that secures this end. (House Hearings, February 21, 1928, p. 67.) Supporting this view is the testimony of such men as Prof. Frederic A. Ogg, of the department of political science of the University of Wisconsin; Prof. Thomas H. Reed, of the department of political science of the University of Michigan; Prof. Charles K. Burdick, dean of the Cornell University Law School; Prof. J. S. Hall, dean of the University of Chicago Law School; Prof. Max Farrand, former professor of American history at Yale, and now director of research in the Huntington Library at Pasadena, Calif.

When I originally approached this problem of reapportionment I did so with an open mind. My ultimate conclusions were reached with an eye to results rather than mere futility of argument. The House of Representatives decided for itself to recommend major fractions. There is constitutional warrant for major fractions. Therefore I stood for major fractions and so did the Senate Committee on Commerce. Then came the unfortunate detour. Quarreling over mathematics the Senate once more permitted the basic constitutional mandate to be given another anesthetic.

The contest will be renewed in the approaching extra session. The reapportionment bill will be reintroduced into the Senate on the first day of the extra session. I am suggesting to the members of the Committee on Commerce to study the problem of fractions in the interim before Congress again meets. I have no pride of opinion regarding this comparatively minor phase of the problem. In fact, I will frankly say to you that I consider it so utterly secondary to the main objective that I am perfectly willing to treat it from the standpoint of expediency and to take whichever method will best win a Senate and House majority. But I do hope that when next a reapportionment measure is reported and a mathematical process thus accepted that there will cease to be external debate over this phase of the problem which encourages continued internal division * * *.

I beg your indulgence for the length of this communication. But it indicates how highly I value your good opinions and how much I appreciate your interest in this problem.

With warm personal regards and best wishes, I am,

Cordially and faithfully,

A. H. VANDENBERG.

CAMBRIDGE, MASS., January 31, 1929.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WALSH: I thank you heartily for your letter of January 26. I am very glad that you have communicated with the National Academy of Sciences in regard to the mathematics of the reapportionment bill.

I inclose a copy of what I think is the simplest explanation of the method of equal proportions which has yet been given.

Very sincerely yours,

EDWARD V. HUNTINGTON,

Professor of Mechanics, Harvard University.

MEMORANDUM ON THE METHOD OF EQUAL PROPORTIONS

The Constitution requires that the number of Representatives assigned to each State shall be proportional to the population of that State; and the exact amount of representation to which each State would be entitled in a theoretically perfect apportionment can be calculated at once by the simple rules of arithmetic. But the result of this calculation will not ordinarily be a whole number. Since it is not feasible to give a State, say, 3.14 Representatives, a mathematical problem is presented as to the true meaning of proportionality under these conditions. The history of this problem divides itself into two sharply contrasted periods.

In the earlier period, up to 1921, no adequate mathematical information was available, and Congress was obliged to experiment with various cut-and-try processes of computation, none of which had any scientific foundation.

In the modern period, beginning with 1921, a series of papers (the latest of which appeared in the transactions of the American Mathematical Society for January, 1928) has provided for the first time a satisfactory insight into the real nature of the problem. These papers have not only clarified the statement of the problem, but have provided the first simple and accurate test of a good apportionment; the resulting method is known as the method of equal proportions, which it is the purpose of this memorandum to explain.

In any practical case some disparities among the States are unavoidable. The problem is to make these disparities as small as possible. Now the most natural way to measure the disparity between two States is to consider the population per Representative (that is, the size of the congressional district) in each State, and compare the two. Thus:

If the congressional district in one State is, say, 10 per cent larger than the congressional district in another State, then the "disparity" between the two States is said to be 10 per cent.

Examples 1 and 2 will make the process clear.

The method of equal proportions distributes the seats among the several States in such a way that any transfer of a seat from any State to any other State will be found to increase, rather than decrease, the disparity between the two States. In other words, an apportionment made according to the method of equal proportions is one which can not be "improved" by any shift in the assignment.

Example 3 is a simple numerical illustration of the application of this test.

This method was promptly approved by the Advisory Committee of the Census, which held extensive hearings on the subject in 1921, at the request of Senator Sutherland, and published an elaborate report, which was unanimous. The method has since been indorsed by a general consensus of scientific opinion, and the technical details of the computation are well understood by the Bureau of the Census.

The contrast between the modern method of equal proportions and all the older methods is striking. In the older methods, the discussion was all about the technical details of the computation and little or no attention was paid to the fairness of the final result. The modern theory does away altogether with the endless disputes about "divisors" and "remainders" and "fractions" and proceeds at once to the direct comparison between the States. It is the only method which puts every State as nearly as possible on a parity with every other State as the Constitution requires.

EXAMPLE 1.—How to measure the "disparity" between two States

[The populations are given in round numbers to make the arithmetic easy; but State A may be thought of as Nebraska and State B as Oregon]

State	Population	Representatives	Congressional district
A	1,500,000	5	300,000
B	960,000	4	240,000
Dividing the greater by the less		$\frac{300,000}{240,000}$	=1.25
Disparity		25 per cent.

This means simply that the congressional district in one State exceeds the congressional district in the other State by 25 per cent.

EXAMPLE 2.—How to measure the "disparity" between two States

[In this example the populations are the same as in Example 1, but the assignment of Representatives has been changed from 5 and 4 to 6 and 3]

State	Population	Representatives	Congressional district
A	1,500,000	6	250,000
B	960,000	3	320,000
Dividing the greater by the less		$\frac{320,000}{250,000}$	=1.28.
Disparity		28 per cent.

In this case the congressional district in one State exceeds the congressional district in the other State by 28 per cent.

EXAMPLE 3.—Which assignment is the better?

[This example is a comparison of the assignments proposed in examples 1 and 2]

State	Population	First proposal	Second proposal
A	1,500,000	5	6
B	960,000	4	3
Disparity		Per cent 25	Per cent 28

Here the first proposal is obviously the more equitable.

EXAMPLE 4.—An actual case under the 1920 census

State	Population, 1920	Method
		Harmonic mean	Equal proportions	Major fractions
New York	10,380,589	41	42	43
Rhode Island	604,397	3	2	2
Vermont	352,428	2	2	1
Disparity—		Per cent	Per cent	Per cent
Between New York and Rhode Island		26	22	----------
Between New York and Vermont		----------	40	46

CRITICISM OF THE METHOD OF MAJOR FRACTIONS

The method of major fractions used in 1911 was the last of the cut-and-try methods employed by Congress in the period before the modern theory became available. This is the method which the opponents of the method of equal proportions desire to retain.

The official description of the method of major fractions in the report of the House Committee on the Census (accompanying H. R. 11725) confines itself to the technical details of the computation and gives no clue whatever to the fairness or unfairness of the result.

Thus the arbitrary series of numbers, 1½, 2½, 3½, etc., by which the population of each State is divided has no discernible connection with the constitutional requirement of proportionality. Again, the so-called "full quota," which is included in the process, bears no relation to the true "ratio of population to Representatives" and is not in any sense the "standard size" of a congressional district.

The character of the actual result obtained by this process can be made clear, however, by a further consideration of the fundamental idea of the disparity between two States.

The disparity between two States as defined above is a relative difference, expressible at pleasure either in terms of the "congressional district" or in terms of the "individual share" (that is, the number of Representatives per inhabitant).

The opponents of the method of equal proportion contend, however, that the absolute difference should be used instead of the relative difference. There are two objections to this plan.

First, if the absolute difference is used, it becomes a difficult and complicated question to decide whether this difference shall be expressed in terms of the congressional district or in terms of the individual share. Although one of these ratios is merely the inverse of the other, yet, as the modern theory has shown, they lead to two distinct methods of apportionment, one called the method of the harmonic mean (HM) and the other the method of major fractions (MF). There is no mathematical reason for preferring one of these methods to the other.

Second, the absolute difference is not an appropriate quantity to use as a numerical measure of departure from proportionality, since it depends on the absolute size, instead of the relative size, of the two States compared; its use in this problem would be contrary to established scientific principles.

Neither of these objections applies to the method of equal proportions.

Finally, the modern theory has shown that whenever a transfer of a seat from one State to another is proposed, method MF tends to favor the larger and method HM the smaller of the two States, while the method of equal proportions occupies a neutral position between these conflicting methods and has no bias in favor of either the larger or the smaller States. It should be noted in this connection that any State, large or small (omitting the few very small States and the one largest of all), may suffer a loss of either method MF or method HM is adopted; moreover, there are possible distributions of population for which the effect of a wrong choice of method would extend to over half the States in the Union.

COMPARISON OF VARIOUS METHODS OF MEASURING THE DISPARITY BETWEEN TWO STATES (AN ACTUAL CASE UNDER THE 1920 CENSUS)

Referring to the actual case shown in example 4 above, the assignment of seats according to the method of equal proportions is 42 to New York, 2 to Rhode Island, and 2 to Vermont. Method HM would transfer one seat from New York to Rhode Island, while method MF would transfer one seat from Vermont to New York. The effect of each of these transfer is shown in the following tables:

EXAMPLE 5.—Disparity between New York and Rhode Island

State	Population, 1920	Method HM	Method EP	Remarks
New York	10,380,589	41	42
Rhode Island	604,397	3	2
Relative difference of congressional districts.		26 per cent.	22 per cent.	A correct measure of disparity.
Relative difference of individual shares.		26 per cent.	22 per cent.	Do.
Absolute difference of congressional districts.		51,719	55,041	An unscientific measure.
Absolute difference of individual shares.		.000,001,014	.000,000,737	Do.

This example shows that according to 3 out of 4 of the proposed ways of measuring departure from proportionality method HM is worse than method EP. To defend method HM it would be necessary to hold that the "absolute difference between the congressional districts," which is known to be an unscientific measure of disparity, is the only one to be used.

EXAMPLE 6.—Disparity between New York and Vermont

State	Population, 1920	Method EP	Method MF	Remarks
New York	10,380,589	42	43
Vermont	352,428	2	1
Relative difference of congressional districts.		40 per cent.	46 per cent.	A correct measure of disparity.
Relative difference of individual shares.		40 per cent.	46 per cent.	Do.
Absolute difference of congressional districts.		70,943	111,019	An unscientific measure.
Absolute difference of individual shares.		0.000001629	0.000001305	Do.

This example shows that according to three out of four of the proposed ways of measuring departure from proportionality, method MF is worse than method EP. To defend the method MF, it would be necessary to hold that the "absolute difference between the individual shares," which is known to be an unscientific measure of disparity, is the only one to be used.

As to the technical details of the computation, all these methods are on the same level of complexity; but as to the actual results obtained, the method of equal proportions is by far the simplest.

CAMBRIDGE, MASS., February 8, 1929.

Hon. JOHN Q. TILSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have read with great interest your article in the New York Times for Sunday, February 3, and heartily approve your desire to reapportion the House, at its present size, under the provisions of the Constitution.

If, however, the theory of representation which you set forth so very clearly in paragraph 3 is sound, then the provisions of the pending bill (H. R. 11725) are not only mathematically but also constitutionally wrong. The method of major fractions, prescribed in the bill, stands in flat contradiction to the theory which you state.

Without going into any questions of constitutional interpretation, I wish to call your attention to two undisputed facts of a purely mathematical nature.

1. The method of major fractions does not insure that a majority of the House will represent a majority of the people.

As a matter of fact the theory that "a majority of the House ought to represent a majority of the people, regardless of State lines," is mathematically self-contradictory, and can not be met by any method of apportionment.

2. The method of major fractions does not insure, even approximately, that each Member of the House shall speak for an equal number of people.

The requirement that each Member of the House shall represent as nearly as possible an equal number of people has always and rightly been regarded as a fair and reasonable test of a good apportionment; but on any known basis of measurement (relative or absolute) the method of equal proportions will meet this requirement more nearly than the method of major fractions.

Quite aside from any questions of constitutional interpretation, it is an established mathematical fact that the method of major fractions makes no attempt whatever to equalize the congressional districts among the several States.

3. The unanimous report of the advisory committee of the census (1921) concludes as follows: "The method of equal proportions, consistent as it is with the literal meaning of the words of the Constitution, is logically superior to the method of major fractions."

Would it not seem strange if this well-considered opinion were totally ignored by Congress at the very moment when it is engaged in selecting a definite mathematical formula to be embodied in permanent legislation?

Very sincerely yours,

EDWARD V. HUNTINGTON,

NATIONAL ACADEMY OF SCIENCES,
Washington, D. C., February 7, 1929.

Senator DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington.

DEAR SENATOR WALSH: In reply to your letter of January 26, 1929, I take pleasure, by direction of the president of the academy, in transmitting a statement recently prepared by a committee of the National Academy of Sciences regarding the purely mathematical aspects of the different methods of reapportionment.

Very respectfully,

DAVID WHITE, Home Secretary.

REPORT TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE NATIONAL ACADEMY OF SCIENCES

The committee appointed by you, in response to the request of the Speaker of the House of Representatives for information regarding the mathematical aspects of the problem of reapportionment, submits the following report:

The Constitution provides that "Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed." * * * "But each State shall have at least one Representative."

If fractional voting were permitted in the House of Representatives the exact number of Representatives with whole votes, and the size of the fractional vote for an additional Representative, to which each State would be entitled in a theoretically perfect apportionment could be readily calculated. It would only be necessary to work out the following proportion: The number of votes for any particular State is to the total number of votes for all States as the population of the particular State is to the total population of all States.

If, however, this simple proportionality were calculated it would result in nearly all cases that the number of Representatives for each particular State would consist of a whole number and a fraction, as, for example, 7.3. Fractional voting is not permitted. Therefore it is necessary to reach a solution of the apportionment problem in whole numbers. This fact alters the mathematical nature of the problem fundamentally. Even when the exact number of votes, including fractions, belonging theoretically to each State is precisely known, this knowledge is not of itself sufficient to determine the proper number of Representatives to be apportioned to that State. The proper apportionment of integral numbers of Representatives to a particular State may differ by several units from the number obtained by simple proportion. This is true regardless of which of the several known methods of apportionment described below is adopted.

The problem of apportionment which has been thus described is a problem in applied mathematics. It should be understood that frequently a problem in applied mathematics may have no unique solution, for the reason that the data initially given do not completely characterize the solution mathematically. In such cases a solution must be chosen for other than mathematical reasons among those which are mathematically possible.

There are five methods of apportionment now known which are unambiguous (that is, lead to a workable solution), and should be considered at this time.

These five methods are—
Method of smallest divisors.
Method of the harmonic mean.
Method of equal proportions.
Method of major fractions.
Method of greatest divisors.

In the present state of knowledge your committee regards these as the only methods of apportionment avoiding the so-called Alabama paradox which require consideration at this time. Their effectiveness is based upon a mathematical test which will be described below. Another method of approach to the apportionment problem may be based upon the adjustment by some method of curve fitting (as, for example, the methods of least squares) of representation to the population of the country as a whole, but in the opinion of your committee the methods of this type so far proposed, which do not lead to solutions among the five listed above, fail.

After full consideration of these various methods your committee is of the opinion that, on mathematical grounds, the method of equal proportions is the method to be preferred. Each of the other four methods listed is, however, consistent with itself and unambiguous.

The essential mathematical characteristics of the five methods are as follows:

Let the population of a State A and the number of Representatives assigned to it according to a selected method of apportionment be a, and let B and b represent the corresponding numbers for a second State. Under an ideal apportionment the population A/a, B/b of the congressional districts in the two States should be equal, as well as the numbers a/A, b/B of Representatives per person in each State. In practice it is impossible to bring this desirable result about for all pairs of States.

In the opinion of this committee the best test of a desirable apportionment so far proposed is the following:

"An apportionment of Representatives to the various States, when the total number of Representatives is fixed, is mathematically satisfactory if for every pair of States the discrepancy between the numbers A/a and B/b can not be decreased by assigning one more Representative to the State A and one fewer to the State B or vice versa, or if the two numbers a/A and b/B have the same property.

"For the purposes of discussion let A/a be larger than B/b so that the State A is underrepresented as compared with B. If the 'discrepancy' between A/a and B/b is defined to be the percentage discrepancy, that is, the difference A/a—B/b divided by the smaller B/b of the two numbers A/a, B/b and if the discrepancy between b/B and a/A is measured in the same way, the test above leads to an apportionment which satisfies the test when applied to either the pair A/a, B/b, or the pair a/A, b/B. The method so determined has been called the 'method of equal proportions.'"

If the test is applied only to the pair a/A, b/B, and if the discrepancy between these numbers is interpreted to be the absolute difference b/B—a/A, another method of apportionment called the "method of major fractions" is uniquely determined. If, on the other hand, the test is applied only to the absolute difference of the pair A/a, B/b, a third method, called the "method of the harmonic mean," is similarly defined.

It has been shown that there are two further methods of apportionment determined by the test set down above when applied to the differences b—aB/A, bA/B—a. These are called, respectively, the "method of smallest divisors," and the "method of greatest divisors."

The methods thus briefly characterized mathematically are the five methods in the list above. Each method in the list favors the larger States as compared with the methods which precede it. This means in the case of the second and fourth methods, for example, that if for two unequal States A, B, the fourth method assigns more Representatives to A and fewer to B than the second method, then the State A is the larger of A and B.

The method of the harmonic mean and the method of major fractions are symmetrically situated on the list. Mathematically there is no reason for choosing between them. A similar symmetry exists for the methods of smallest and greatest divisors for which the defining discrepancies seem, however, more artificial than those for any one of the other three methods.

The method of equal proportions is preferred by the committee because it satisfies the test proposed above when applied either to sizes of congressional districts or to numbers of Representatives per person, and because it occupies mathematically a neutral position with respect to emphasis on larger and smaller States.

Senator DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WALSH: In your letter of January 26 you indicated that you were requesting the National Academy of Sciences for information in regard to the mathematical facts about methods of apportionment, in accordance with the suggestions which I made in Science for December 14, 1928.

As I am keenly interested in the scientific aspects of this problem, I should esteem it a great personal favor if you would be kind enough to ask your secretary to send me a copy of your correspondence with the academy on this subject.

With great respect, I am, very sincerely yours,

EDWARD V. HUNTINGTON,
Professor of Mechanics, Harvard University.

If you happen to see an article by Professor Willcox in the current issue of Science, you may be interested in a reply thereto, which I inclose herewith.

In regard to the danger involved in reopening the question of method, I have just been informed by a responsible leader of the House of Representatives that if the Senate should substitute the method of equal proportions for the method of major fractions, he is quite sure that there would be no difficulty whatever in agreeing to this amendment in the House.

REPLY TO PROFESSOR WILLCOX

In his article in Science for February 8, 1929, pages 163–165, Prof. W. F. Willcox simply repeats erroneous mathematical statements the falsity of which had already been called to his attention. (See Science, December 14, 1928.)

Professor Willcox contends that the choice between "equal proportions" and "major fractions" is a political and not a mathematical problem. His arguments, however, are mathematical, and involve gross misstatements of the mathematical facts.

For example, the statement on page 164 that a certain series of quotients "would sum up to 435" is false. Again, on page 165, the statement that the "method of minimum range" is the same as the "method of the harmonic mean" is false. And again, his whole description of the method of equal proportions is grotesque.

It appears to be only by evasive and misleading arguments like these that the method of major fractions can be defended.

It is small wonder that he thinks it "undesirable" to request "a report on the mathematical facts" from any competent body of scholars.

Senator DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WALSH: I am informed that the bill for the reapportionment of Members of the House is pending before the Senate for action and that a controversy has arisen as to the proper method of computing the quota of Representatives to be assigned to each State. Some time ago that subject was carefully studied by a number of eminent mathematicians, including the leading members of the department of mathematics at Harvard University, and they came to the conclusion that the so-called method of equal proportions is the method of apportionment which best satisfies the requirements of the Constitution. Since that is the fact, it seems a pity that any other rule of apportionment should be written into the law, particularly the rule recommended by Professor Willcox of Cornell. If the Senate wishes to put political expediency first, the largest States would be better served by the so-called rule of rejected fractions which was employed from 1790 to 1840, since under that rule the larger States would get the most Representatives. Professor Willcox's method neither has the advantage of giving the largest States the greatest possible number of Representatives nor of satisfying a mathematical test, consistent with the constitutional requirement that Members be apportioned among the States according to their respective numbers.

Very truly yours,

A. N. HOLCOMBE, Chairman.

ORDER FOR EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] if it is not possible at a certain time early in the day for us to go into executive session merely for the consideration of unobjected nominations?

Mr. CURTIS. It was my intention, as soon as the conference reports on the two appropriation bills were acted upon, to ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, to consider unobjected nominations on the Executive Calendar, and I submit that request now.

Mr. HARRISON. Could we not now fix a time when we may go into executive session merely for the consideration of unobjected nominations? It would not take long, and then those would be out of the way.

Mr. CURTIS. I think we had better make the agreement as I have suggested it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Kansas. The Committee on Public Lands and Surveys has reported a resolution providing that the committee may continue to operate under Senate Resolution 202, and I want to get action on that.

Mr. CURTIS. There will be plenty of time to take that up to-day. There are only two conference reports pending and one to come over, and there will be plenty of time.

Mr. NYE. I have no objection to the agreement proposed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request submitted by the Senator from Kansas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

RETIREMENT OF EMERGENCY OFFICERS

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, there has been on the calendar for some time a bill to amend the so-called Tyson-Fitzgerald Act for the relief of emergency officers and their retirement. I have just received a letter from General Hines, Chief of the Veterans' Bureau, which will be of interest to emergency officers of the World War seeking retirement. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MARCH 1, 1929.

Hon. HIRAM BINGHAM,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR BINGHAM: Reference is made to the bureau's administration of the emergency officers' retirement act and to the pending amendment to that act, which you recently introduced.

In connection with your proposed amendment, it is believed that information regarding the present status of the administration of the act will be of value to you, and it is thought you should have such information in your possession.

There have been received to date 8,498 applications, and of this number the Emergency Officers' Retirement Board has recommended retirement with pay in 2,756; retirement without pay in 427, and has determined that 2,759 of those who have applied are not entitled to retirement benefits. A review by reason of the Attorney General's opinions of January 18, 1929, is now in process of the 2,759 cases in which unfavorable decisions had previously been rendered, and it is anticipated that favorable decisions will issue in a large number of these cases.

It will be noted from the above figures that the Retirement Board has acted on 5,942 claims, leaving a balance of approximately 2,500 claims awaiting action, and it is believed that with the exception of those cases in which it will be necessary to obtain additional evidence, such as report from the War Department, medical examination, etc., that action upon the remaining claims will be completed by or about April 15, 1929.

Very truly yours,

FRANK T. HINES, Director.

WILLIAM S. WELCH

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I wish to withdraw the motion previously made by me to reconsider the votes whereby the bill (S. 2127) for the relief of William S. FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15848) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and prior fiscal years, to provide urgent supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in the first deficiency appropriation bill on page 16 there is this provision:

Refunding taxes illegally collected: For an additional amount for refunding taxes illegally or erroneously collected, as provided by law, including the payment of claims for the fiscal year 1929 and prior years,

$75,000,000: Provided, That a report shall be made to Congress by internal-revenue districts, and alphabetically arranged, of all disbursements hereunder in excess of $500 as required by section 3 of the act of May 29, 1928 (45 Stat. 996), including the names of all persons and corporations to whom such payments are made, together with the amount paid to each.

When the Senate had this bill under consideration, it added this further proviso:

Provided, That no part of the funds herein appropriated for tax refunds, where the claim is in excess of $10,000 shall be paid out except upon hearings before any committee or officer in the department conducting same, which hearings shall be open to the public, and the decision shall be a public document.

It will be recalled that this amendment went to conference with the so-called prohibition amendment, and the House for a long time refused to concur because of these two provisions in the bill.

Recently another arrangement has been made, and the House agreed to concur, and in lieu of that last proviso the conference committee has reported the following:

Provided, That no part of the foregoing appropriation shall be used to pay any refund of an income or profits tax pursuant to a claim allowed after the enactment of this act in excess of $20,000 (other than payments in cases in which a suit in court or a proceeding before the Board of Tax Appeals has been or shall be instituted or payments in cases determined upon precedents established in decisions of courts or the Board of Tax Appeals) unless a hearing has been held before a committee or official of the Bureau of Internal Revenue; and the decision of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in any such refund allowance in excess of $20,000 shall be a public record.

Mr. President, I want to say that the provision which was in the original deficiency bill, put there by the Senate, was inserted virtually by the unanimous vote of the Senate. As I recollect, there were no votes cast against it.

I think the Senate is overwhelmingly in favor of a provision of that kind in this bill. I do not intend to criticize the Senate conferees at all; I think our Senate conferees tried to get the best kind of a provision that they could; but instead of getting a good provision, the conferees have emasculated the provision which the Senate adopted. This provision is virtually utterly worthless, and I now intend to show why it is utterly worthless.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HEFLIN. I suggest to the Senator that it looks as if the Senate conferees abandoned the Senate position in favor of the House position.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not going to criticize the members of the conference on the part of the Senate.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator has no right to do so.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not going to do it, but I am going to say this——

Mr. HEFLIN. In effect, I take it, that that is what happened.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will bear with me just a moment, I will explain what happened.

During the eight years when Andrew W. Mellon has been Secretary of the Treasury, over three and a half billion dollars have been paid out by him under a secret refund system. Mr. Mellon says he has nothing to do with paying the refunds, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Mr. Blair, says he has nothing personally to do with it, the Assistant Secretary, Mr. Bond, having charge of it, says he has nothing to do with it. Well, who does it? They say that some clerk pays out these enormous sums. Think of it, Senators; $3,500,000,000 paid out in eight years, and this body has no knowledge of the details and the body at the other end of the Capitol has no such knowledge. When they ask about it, they are told it is none of the Congress's business. What is Congress's business, according to their view of it? It is to furnish the money, and that is all.

What are these refunds for? Nobody knows. Who gets them? They publish the names of those who get them; and, by the way, it took us years to get a provision of that kind through, just to get the names. It took years of work on the part of the Senate of the United States to obtain even the names of those to whom these great refunds were paid.

Mr. President, we have appropriated for the ensuing year $130,000,000 for tax refunds. This is the most important matter that has come before the Congress or any Congress for many years. Why, we talked about the oil scandal when some $400,000,000 worth of oil was stolen from the Government, fraudulently taken from the Government, and yet here is the Secretary of the Treasury secretly paying out in tax refunds every year more than the $400,000,000 which was involved in the oil scandal.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. WARREN. Judging from the statements of the Senator he is charging the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue with being guilty of wrong practices in paying out millions of dollars of money in secrecy. Is that what the Senator charges?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; that is not my statement.

Mr. WARREN. What does his wild flight mean, then? Have they paid out that money secretly?

Mr. McKELLAR. I charge that the Secretary of the Treasury in a secret system is paying back to taxpayers secretly, according to his own testimony, not knowing himself——

Mr. WARREN. Paying back that which does not belong to the taxpayers? Is that what the Senator charges?

Mr. McKELLAR. That which in many cases does not belong to them.

I say, if those funds belong to those taxpayers they would not be afraid to come out in the open and ask for them; and the Secretary of the Treasury, if it were done fairly and honestly and justly, would not be afraid to come out in the open and say that it was being properly done.

Mr. WARREN. It seems the Secretary of the Treasury is saying one thing and the Senator from Tennessee is saying another thing. I suppose we can take our choice as to which one we would believe, and whether the Secretary of the Treasury has corruptly paid out money or whether he has not!

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will take his own time to defend the Secretary of the Treasury, it will be much more pleasing to me.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator had better restrain his temper.

Mr. McKELLAR. Three billion five hundred million dollars of the people's money has been paid out; and do you know what is said? It is said, for instance, that the United States Steel Corporation, which was paid back secretly for the year 1917 the enormous sum of $57,000,000, received it back because of a mistake. Who is there that is so simple-minded as to believe that the United States Steel Corporation in 1917 made a mistake of $57,000,000 in its own tax return? I do not think anyone believes it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. The United States Steel Corporation did not make the mistake. It was a jeopardy assessment that was placed there by the department itself.

Mr. McKELLAR. It was a jeopardy assessment?

Mr. SMOOT. It was.

Mr. McKELLAR. How does the Senator get his information? Where does he get it?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Tennessee knows it as well as the Senator from Utah.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no. There is no proof of it. They declined to give any facts about it.

Mr. SMOOT. It was a jeopardy assessment placed upon them, as jeopardy assessments were placed upon thousands of taxpayers, when they did not know whether the proper amount was $57,000,000 or $100,000,000 or $500,000 or $500 or $50. The jeopardy assessments were placed there knowing in most cases that they were more than the taxpayer would eventually have to pay.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Utah does not know a thing in the world about what he is saying. That is absolutely not true.

Mr. SMOOT. I say it is true.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not mean to say the statement of the Senator is untrue, but I mean to say that his statement of facts is wholly incorrect.

Mr. SMOOT. I say it is correct.

Mr. McKELLAR. The truth of the business is that on their assessment of the United States Steel Corporation, $27,000,000 was paid back for the year 1917 on the return which the Steel Corporation itself made. Thirty-three million dollars more was paid back in the way of depletions, whatever they are. That is nearly $60,000,000 in all that was paid back to the Steel Corporation secretly for the one year. It is said that if there was a mistake the Steel Corporation ought to get the advantage of it, and that is true. But if it was a mistake, why should not the Congress have the facts? The facts have not been given to the Congress. They conceal the facts from the Congress. They decline to let the Congress have the information. When an amendment is offered to a bill to provide for information, what happens to it? Mr. Mellon writes a letter to his friends in the House and to his friends in the Senate and they get busy and emasculate the provision. We can get no hearings to develop what occurs in his department.

Let me refer again to the Steel Corporation. For 1917 the enormous sum, as I said, of $27,000,000, $16,000,000 in principal and $11,000,000 in interest, is allowed them in the way of a refund. In 1917 the Steel Corporation sold the most of its wares to the Government of the United States. It put its taxes into its price in making those sales. The people had to pay them and yet notwithstanding that the Steel Corporation received the amount of those taxes through its sales of steel to the Government of the United States, now 10 years after those sales it receives back those taxes with interest.

Mr. President, let us take the tobacco case. We got some information about the tobacco case and the Steel Corporation case by accident. We got the facts in those cases because a Member of the House happened to say something about them he ought not to have said, but we got some of the facts about those two cases anyway. One of the big tobacco companies—they call it the "X" Tobacco Co., whatever that means—received $5,000,000 refund—and why? Simply because the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in his judgment thought they had paid too much. It was purely a matter of discretion lodged in him by the Congress, and he made that decision and allowed a $5,000,000 refund. Who knows whether it was right or not? Will they give us information about it? No; but they come and ask us to pay it.

What other claimants against the Government come and ask for money to be paid out secretly in that way? No other claimant presents claims in that way. They come openly and give their reasons. They speak openly and their claims are submitted openly and are passed upon openly. But here these great corporations that want enormous tax refunds come secretly and go to a clerk in the department and get their claims through in these enormous sums. The moment they pay their taxes, that moment they make a claim for refund. The tax-refund business is getting to be one of the greatest businesses in the country. They have a horde of tax attorneys now engaged in that business.

Mr. President, this is the second amendment that has been emasculated in conference. It will be approved by the Senate when it is offered, but when it gets into conference it is emasculated. It is fixed so it can do no good. It is fixed so the Congress can not find out anything about the facts. It is fixed so that it is immaterial. It is absolutely made nugatory in conference every time, and we are presented with the question of agreeing to nugatory provisions about it or the deficiency bill will not pass.

Mr. President, I yield again for the private conversations which are going on in the Chamber.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I think the Senator is entitled to a hearing, and I appeal for order in the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is well taken. The Senate is not in order. Let there be order.

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand that President-elect Hoover is going to reappoint Mr. Mellon as Secretary of the Treasury. Some say Mr. Hoover will send his name in here next Monday for confirmation. Others say he will not take that risk, that he is going simply to hold him over, that he does not have to reappoint him. He does not want to assume the discredit of reappointing him. Some say he will be appointed for a while until Hoover can ease out from under him. I do not know what course Hoover is going to take. I am not in his confidence. But I want to say if Mr. Hoover sends Mr. Mellon's name in here as the nominee for the office of Secretary of the Treasury, there is one vote that is going to be cast against him. I am going to vote against him because I do not believe that he is qualified under the law to be Secretary of the Treasury.

In the first place, I believe Mr. Mellon is an inefficient Secretary of the Treasury. I think he has shown that he is an inefficient Secretary of the Treasury. Any Secretary under whose administration $3,500,000,000 of mistakes occur in eight years ought to be discharged for incompetency and inefficiency. No other Secretary of the Treasury has ever made such mistakes. No other Secretary of the Treasury has ever paid back one-tenth, nay, even one-fiftieth part, probably not one-hundredth part of the revenues he has collected. It is inexcusable. Why, instead of taxes being collected openly and fairly, as the law provides, we find that the Secretary of the Treasury is imposing these taxes and collecting them with one hand and putting them in the pockets of the Government, and then paying them back with the other hand.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Has it occurred to the Senator that most of those refunds were of taxes collected during the war years of 1917 and 1918?

Mr. McKELLAR. I think that is the fact, but we have no knowledge of it. The Senate has no knowledge of it. I am glad the Senator mentioned it. When those taxes were imposed in 1917 against the Steel Co. and the Tobacco Co., the only two companies as to whose taxes we have any facts before us, those two companies paid the taxes imposed. They got prices for their wares based upon those taxes which they then paid, and now 10 years afterwards, when they have collected from the people sufficient profits to cover the taxes that were then imposed, they come back here serenely and calmly and secretly making claims for refunds, and one of them we find is to get a refund of $58,000,000 for one year of taxes paid 10 years ago.

Who paid it out? "Mr. Mellon, did you pay it out?" "No; I have nothing to do with those things." "Mr. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, did you pay it out?" "Oh, no; I do not have time to do it." "Mr. Assistant Secretary Bond, you have this matter in charge; did you pay it out?" "Oh, no; I never bother about such trifling matters."

The sum of $3,500,000,000 of the people's money is refunded, and not a man in the department has ever said that he had anything to do with refunding those claims. It is done secretly; we do not know how it is done; we do not know what the reasons are; we do not know what the claims are; we know nothing about it; and yet we are called upon twice a year to appropriate the money. We have been appropriating about $300,000,000 a year for several years. This year one amount was $130,000,000, and here is $75,000,000 more, aggregating $205,000,000. Of course, we shall have another deficiency. The expenditure for this purpose will probably again amount to $300,000,000.

"How many more claims are there, Mr. Secretary?" "I do not know." "How many more are there, Mr. Commissioner?" "I do not know." "What are these claims about, Mr. Secretary and Mr. Commissioner?" "We do not know, and you are not permitted to find out; we refer you to the law."

I have a letter from these gentlemen stating that they are prohibited by law from telling a Representative or a Senator what these claims are for, for what the claims money is going to be used.

I am opposed to any such secrecy in conducting Government business; I am opposed to any such secret system of Government. I have been fighting it for the last six years. I succeeded in having two provisions inserted in the law. The one inserted two years ago was made nugatory. It was found that there was a big sentiment in the country in favor of it, and something had to be done; so here is the nugatory provision which was inserted. Senators, listen to this—

> Provided, That a report shall be made to Congress by internal-revenue districts, and alphabetically arranged, of all disbursements hereunder in excess of $500 as required by section 3 of the act of May 29, 1928 (45 Stat. 996), including the names of all persons and corporations to whom such payments are made, together with the amount paid to each.

Such reports are filed in the Ways and Means Committee room. The newspapers get some of the more important refunds, but the others are left there. We do not know why they were paid; we do not know whether or not they were justly paid; no man in the world knows whether they are paid fairly and justly or not. It is this system of secrecy to which I am opposed. The provision which I have read took the place of one which provided for publicity in such matters, which was stricken out in conference, just as the provision was stricken out of the pending bill.

What was the result? When the conferees struck it out they inserted a nugatory provision, just such as they have put in here. When the bill came up before the Senate for consideration we inserted this provision in it unanimously; there was not a dissenting voice. Why? Because we all knew it was right. We knew that this system of secrecy was wrong, and we inserted this provision:

> Provided, That no part of the funds herein appropriated for tax refunds where the claim is in excess of $10,000 shall be paid out except upon hearings before any committee or officer in the department conducting same, which hearings shall be open to the public, and the decision shall be a public document.

If there is nothing to cover up, how would that provision hurt? If there is nothing to conceal, why should not that course be pursued? The amendment left everything to the department; the allowance of tax refunds was not taken out of the department. The only thing that was required was that these hearings should be open, just as other hearings are. Senators, how can objection be made to that? How can we longer provide for a secret system under which three and one-half billion dollars have been paid in eight years—to whom, God knows; nobody knows. There is no Senator here who knows that a single one of these claims is right. There is but one way to ascertain, and that is to have an open hearing, where the claimants may come with their counsel and, if they have just claims, where the Government may accord a fair and open hearing and pass upon the claims in the light of day. Under the system practiced in the department they pay out in secret enormous sums of the people's money. It is not fair; it is not right; it is an iniquitous system, a system of government for which no nation ought to stand; and surely this Nation ought not to stand for it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee permit me to interrupt him right there?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. In response to a resolution that I introduced, and which was adopted by the Senate, the Secretary of the Treasury has furnished a list of those to whom he refunded taxes for 1927, but no such list has been furnished for 1928. The Senate has not a list of those upon whom these gifts have been bestowed for 1928.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Congress appropriates this $250,000,000 of the people's money without being able to state a single fact about the expenditure or being able to ascertain a single fact which would justify it. The Treasury Department is hermetically sealed from the public. Even Comptroller General McCarl has no jurisdiction over the Treasury Department. He has jurisdiction over every other department of the Government. He has jurisdiction over the expenditures of the Executive himself; but, oh, no, he has no jurisdiction over "Uncle Andy"; "Uncle Andy" controls his own department; he keeps it hermetically sealed, so far as the public is concerned, and so far as any other official of the Government is concerned. That is why I have been fighting to bring these transactions out into the open. I have nothing personal against Mr. Mellon, but I do not believe that he is a faithful public servant, for, in my opinion, no public servant is faithful whose deeds are in the dark and whose system is a system of secrecy. That is the truth, and we all know it. How are we going to defend it? When you go home, Senators, and your constituents ask you why is Mr. Mellon spending $205,000,000 this year in tax refunds, you can not tell them; you have no information about it, and Mr. Mellon boldly tells you that the law protects him. He can pay out all the money he can get for tax-refund purposes. He comes up here at the first part of each session and at the last part of each session and demands a lump sum. He tells you to give it, but furnishes no information as to what he is going to do with it.

In those circumstances the conference committee has reported a farcical amendment, one that does not provide that the people or their representatives shall know what is being done in the case of tax refunds. I am going to vote against the conference report.

Mr. President, I said that Mr. Mellon ought not to be reappointed Secretary of the Treasury and he ought not to be so reappointed. He ought never to have held the office. He is disqualified under the law from holding the office. Now, I will tell you why. I have to go back a year or two, but it is easy to find. I call attention to the Revised Statutes. Section 3168 of the Revised Statutes provides:

Any internal-revenue officer—

And Mr. Mellon is an internal-revenue officer—who is or shall be interested, directly or indirectly—

How could language be more inclusive?—

in the manufacture of tobacco, snuff, or cigars, or in the production rectification, or redistillation of distilled spirits, shall be dismissed from office.

Now I want to read from a colloquy that took place between the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] and myself several years ago in which he admitted that Mr. Mellon actually owned the Overholt Distillery. I want to read from the colloquy on page 5244 of the RECORD of March 30, 1924:

Mr. McKELLAR. Did Secretary Mellon sell his stock in all the business corporations?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. If the Senator had waited until the sentence was finished, his question would have been answered. Mr. Mellon was also a stockholder in a number of business enterprises, foremost among them being the Aluminum Co. of America, the Gulf Oil Corporation, and the Standard Steel Car Co. In each of those he was and is a minority stockholder—

Remember the statute says "directly or indirectly"— and on the advice of the five lawyers whom I have named Mr. Mellon did not sell his minority interest in the stock of those corporations.

I digress here long enough to say that the Secretary of the Treasury is prohibited by law from being engaged in certain businesses, and these great corporations come under the ban of the law. It was held by the committee that because he was a minority stockholder he was not interested directly or indirectly in those businesses. I quote further from the colloquy as found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

He still owns it; and in our opinion then, and in our opinion now, his right to do so is unquestionable.

Furthermore, he is not at present actively concerned in trade or commerce of any description whatever. As I said, he is not a director and not an officer of any corporation engaged in trade or commerce of any kind——

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. And he does not give his time or his attention to the active conduct of any incorporated business. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I just want to ask the Senator if Mr. Mellon is still a stockholder in what is known as the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Co.?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I am coming to that.

Mr. McKELLAR. And is he also interested in the company known as the Overholt Distilling Co.?

And here is what the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] said:

I am just as much interested as is the Senator from Tennessee in getting the truth of these things, and I promise him I shall not omit either of those subjects in what I have to say.

I will omit a few lines and read what he had to say about the Overholt Distillery Co. Remember this is the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] talking.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Why does the Senator omit what I said about the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will put that in if the Senator desires, but it is not material to this particular discussion. I will, however, read it. The Senator from Pennsylvania continued:

I want to correct an error in the first opinion of Faust & Wilson, which was read at the desk, and that is the statement that when Mr. Stewart resigned as Secretary of the Treasury in President Grant's Cabinet Senator Sherman was appointed in his stead. I think that Messrs. Faust & Wilson were in error on the name and that it was Mr. Boutwell who was appointed to succeed Mr. Stewart in Mr. Grant's Cabinet. It is not important, but I thought for the purpose of accuracy it was well to make the correction.

That is why I omitted it, because, as the Senator himself said, it was immaterial.

Mr. FESS. Senator John Sherman was appointed in President Hayes's Cabinet.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes. In Senate Resolution No. 200, now before us, occurs the statement that "it appears that the said A. W. Mellon is interested in the Overholt Distilling Co." The resolution does not say where it appears. I want to state what the facts are.

For many years past—probably more than 100 years—there has been a partnership known as A. Overholt & Co., which was in the business of distilling whisky in western Pennsylvania. For a great many years—I do not know how many, but I think over 40 years—Mr. A. W. Mellon was one of the partners in that partnership. On the 15th day of December, 1916, three years and one month before the prohibition amendment went into effect——

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, may we have order?

The VICE PRESIDENT rapped for order.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thought there were some Senators, at least, who had more interest in liquor than they appear to have, because I am talking about liquor now.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I hope Senators will listen to what the Senator from Tennessee is saying, because he is quoting words of great wisdom.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am quoting the words of the Senator from Pennsylvania, and I am going to comment on them in a moment and see how wise they are.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SACKETT in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do.

Mr. BRUCE. I merely wanted to say that it seems to be a case of wisdom crying out in the streets and not being heard.

Mr. McKELLAR (reading):

For a great many years—I do not know how many, but I think over 40 years—Mr. A. W. Mellon was one of the partners in that partnership. On the 15th day of December, 1916, three years and one month before the prohibition amendment went into effect, that partnership absolutely ceased from the manufacture of whisky and from doing any of its manufacturing business. The statute which is mentioned in Senate Resolution No. 200 is section 3168 of the Revised Statutes and forbids any internal revenue officer from being interested in the manufacture, production, rectification, or redistillation of distilled spirits. The fact is that if the Secretary of the Treasury is a revenue officer within the meaning of that section—and I am willing to grant that he is for the purpose of the argument—Mr. Andrew W. Mellon has not at any time since December 15, 1916, engaged in the manufacture or production or rectification or redistillation of distilled spirits.

Listen to this! I am still reading from the statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED]:

Before Mr. Mellon took office, after this corporation had been passive for more than four years, four years after it ceased from its manufacturing operations and before he took the oath of office—

Listen to this—

he transferred his whole interest in that enterprise to the Union Trust Co. of Pittsburgh as trustee to close up the business absolutely. He himself has retained no control or discretion or authority whatsoever in that matter.

Now, listen to this:

He will, when the business is finally liquidated, be entitled to his proportion of the net proceeds and no more.

In other words, here is an active trust created by Mr. Mellon, for what purpose? For the purpose of getting around the law and taking office as Secretary of the Treasury. He still owns it. He owns every dollar in the Overholt Distillery Co. in the hands of that trustee that he ever owned as an individual. The statute says "directly or indirectly." That is indirectly owning it. Can anybody doubt it? He is prohibited from being Secretary of the Treasury; he is disqualified under the law; and, as I remember, one of the distinguished predecessors of the present able and splendid Senator from Pennsylvania, Hon. Boies Penrose, gave out an interview in which he said that Mr. Mellon could not accept the office because he was in the distilling business, and therefore he was not eligible to the office. And yet he calmly conveys to the Union Trust Co., I am informed—a corporation owned by himself, or largely by himself—the legal title to this property, and retains the beneficial interest in it!

As lawyers know, that is an active trust. As lawyers know, Mr. Mellon is just as much the owner of that whisky business in the hands of the trustee as he was before. It is a subterfuge. He is not entitled to be Secretary of the Treasury under that statute, passed more than 100 years ago.

If I remember aright, the statute which disqualifies a man from holding the office of Secretary of the Treasury because of being engaged directly or indirectly in the liquor business was passed in 1807. It has been on the statute books all the time. It is on the statute books to-day. For eight years the present Secretary of the Treasury has been holding this office in violation of this law; and that is another reason why I say that if Mr. Hoover sends in the nomination of Mr. Mellon here next Monday, I intend to vote against the confirmation of Mr. Mellon. I do not believe he should be Secretary of the Treasury any longer. I hope Mr. Hoover will not appoint him. I say that a man who has shown himself so inefficient that he makes mistakes to the amount of $3,500,000,000 in collecting taxes from the people in that length of time is too inefficient to be Secretary of the Treasury; and yet some of the newspapers speak of Mr. Mellon as "the greatest Secretary of the Treasury since Alexander Hamilton."

Why, it is inconceivable that he should be reappointed to this office with his record, with his lack of eligibility for the office, with his business interests ramifying everywhere. A committee reported here a few years ago that Mr. Mellon was a stockholder in 62 great corporations. Who knows how many of those corporations have been receiving tax refunds? I know of but one, and that is, less than two months after Mr. Mellon became Secretary of the Treasury the Treasury Department paid to the Gulf Refining Co. $337,000, as I recollect the amount. I see in these reports that the Aluminum Co. of America has been constantly getting refunds of taxes—secret refunds of taxes. I do not know about the other 60 of them. Nobody else knows. Nobody knows what corporations Mr. Mellon is interested in. Everybody knows that he has been, and is now, the beneficial owner of a liquor business; and yet in the last campaign we frequently heard the statement that dry Democrats ought to vote for Mr. Hoover because he was going to give a better enforcement of the liquor law; and here is the present Secretary of the Treasury, and the man Mr. Hoover is supposed to favor for reappointment, probably more extensively engaged in the liquor business than any other man in this country, directly or indirectly.

Mr. President, this amendment that is offered by the conference committee is a subterfuge. I want to read it. Listen to this. Think of this as legislation. What does it mean? Who knows what it means? I should like to have some member of the conference committee explain what it means. What will it do? Will it tell us anything about what is going to be done with this $205,000,000 that we are going to spend secretly for tax refunds this year? I doubt it.

Listen to this:

Provided, That no part of the foregoing appropriation shall be used to pay any refunds of an income or profits tax pursuant to a claim allowed after the enactment of this act in excess of $20,000—

Who knows what that means? Every claim may be allowed before this act is actually signed by the President. It may not refer to a dollar; it may not have anything to do with a dollar of this appropriation—not a dollar. We do not know whether it will or not—

(other than payments in cases in which a suit in court or a proceeding before the Board of Tax Appeals has been or shall be instituted, or payments—

Listen to this, Senators—or payments in cases determined upon precedents established in decisions of courts or the Board of Tax Appeals)—

I doubt if there is a claim that does not come under that head. There have been decisions on almost every conceivable tax question; and if the Secretary of the Treasury were to say, "This would come under the head of decisions or precedents established by decisions of the courts," nobody could say him nay.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. Does the amendment state who is to determine whether or not the refund is in conformity with the precedents?

Mr. McKELLAR. Why, no. I will tell the Senator who determines it. Andrew W. Mellon determines it, or some clerk in his department. Of course, he does not know anything about it himself. He swears that he does not know anything about it himself. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue swore that he did not know anything about it himself. The Assistant Secretary of the Treasury in charge of these matters swore that he did not look after these claims himself. Who does? We do not know. One of them said the committee sometimes did it, and sometimes it was done by an individual. "Who were the committee?" "We will not tell you." Congressmen or Senators have no right to any such information.

Are we going to continue to pay out hundreds of millions—nay, billions—of dollars under circumstances of that kind?

Listen to this:

Unless a hearing has been held before a committee or official of the Bureau of Internal Revenue—

Of course, they can not get a secret refund unless it is held before some official or committee. Not a hearing before a commission, not a public hearing, but a secret hearing is provided for here—and the decision of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in any such refund allowance in excess of $20,000 shall be a public record.

Suppose he just says, "American Tobacco Co., $10,000,000." That is the decision. We had that before. We have not changed the law a particle. We get that at the end of every year.

Mr. President, as I have pointed out heretofore, the Senate put on a real provision, I think two years ago, or perhaps it was one year ago. We were to have some revision of this matter. Instead of that, they put on a provision sending the names and the amounts to the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation. If I remember correctly, that committee has met once since the law was passed, or perhaps twice; and even then it declared itself that it had no authority to revise or to pay any attention to these tax matters. It is absolutely nugatory; and when the Senate came along and put on a measure that did bring about a public hearing on these claims the conference committee knocks that out, and puts in another nugatory provision that never will be of any value.

Mr. President, I just want to say that I have convictions on this matter. I do not believe in secrecy in government.

I do not believe in secret systems of government. I do not believe the Secretary of the Treasury has the right to pay out the people's money secretly, without letting it be known how it is paid out.

Senators, I do not believe that the Congress of the United States has the lawful authority to direct the payment of the people's money in any such fashion as this. I think it is our duty to bring about an open system of tax refunds.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. There is so much confusion here, and some Senators have come in who were not here when the Senator started, that I wish he would explain the difference between the bill as it is now pending before the Senate and as it passed the Senate before.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator that the provision as put in by the unanimous vote of the Senate was as follows.

Mr. HEFLIN. I hope Senators will listen to this, Mr. President, because this matter may be debated all day unless some arrangement is made.

Mr. McKELLAR. The provision which the Senate sent over to the House was as follows:

Provided, That no part of the funds herein appropriated for tax refunds where the claim is in excess of $10,000 shall be paid out except upon hearings before any committee or officer in the department conducting same, which hearings shall be open to the public, and the decision shall be a public document.

How could any honest official of the Government object to that?

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I was wondering if the Senator would frame his amendment so that the amount of money would remain the same, but that whenever the Treasury Department did make a refund of taxes; they would be required to send up to the Senate information, first, as to the amount of money——

Mr. McKELLAR. And the reason for the refund.

Mr. TYDINGS. And the reasons therefor.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator from Maryland that I have been fighting here for six long years to try to get that very system inaugurated, and the moment it is presented the Secretary of the Treasury writes a letter stating that he does not believe in publicity of tax returns. What that has to do with this question I can not imagine. He goes over that ground, and immediately the leaders in this Chamber and in the other Chamber take up the cudgels for him, and fight for him, and they render such a provision nugatory. Why? Because he wants to continue the present secret system. Every payment made may have been honest. If it is honest, what reason can there be for not having the light of day turned on it? It is the people's money we are appropriating, not the Secretary's. Why should not the people know why he is paying out this money?

The Senator is absolutely right. We ought to have a statement from the Secretary of the Treasury giving the facts, and the reasons for his decision, before any money is paid out in this way.

Mr. TYDINGS. I would like to ask the Senator another question. As I understand it, the amendment now requires that amounts of money in excess of a certain figure shall not be refunded until the Senate acts upon the cases.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; it merely provides for an open hearing, where the amount is greater than $10,000. That is all it provides. The reason for that was that the Secretary of the Treasury, in a letter, said that there were an infinite number of small claims—he got very greatly concerned with the small claims all of a sudden—and that the small claims would take a great deal of time if there had to be an open hearing upon each one, so this provision as to $10,000 was put in, and the committee has substituted $20,000 for the $10,000.

Mr. TYDINGS. I did not make myself plain. Suppose the refunds were made exactly as they are now, with the proviso that Congress should be advised of the amounts refunded, and the circumstances under which the refunds were made——

Mr. McKELLAR. That would be perfectly splendid. I have been trying for six years to get that done, but we are blocked every time we undertake to have it done.

Mr. TYDINGS. I was just wondering, if the amendment were framed along that line, whether or not it might not be acceptable to the people who are now in opposition.

Mr. McKELLAR. We have had that up time and time again. Of course, I would accept it, and be delighted to have it, but no one who stands behind Secretary Mellon in this Chamber would agree to it. Mr. Mellon would never agree to it.

Mr. TYDINGS. It seems to me that, conceding the Secretary should have the authority to deal with these cases that he has now, he should furnish the Congress with a statement of the amounts of money refunded and the reasons therefor; in other words, whenever a claim for refund is settled, there is a reason set down in the hearing, and if we had a copy of it, then if we felt it was not proper to make the refund, we could inquire into it.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is exactly right; but that is the very thing the Secretary of the Treasury has fought ever since he has been in office.

Mr. TYDINGS. I wanted to say that I do think it is going a little far to hold up all the money until we have had a chance to look into it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Going a little far? If the Senator pleases, it is an outrageous position for any public officer to take. It is not in keeping with fair and honest dealing among men. If any of these gentlemen have an honest claim against the Government, they ought to have the opportunity to go and present that claim, and let the facts be known, and let the proper officials settle the claim, of course; no one denies that. But we are asked to pay out these sums, to appropriate money for them in advance. For instance, when this bill came in they asked $22,000,000 for this year, but they did not think it would hold out. They had a great many claims. We asked, "How many have you?" "I do not know." "What are they?" "We can not tell you."

Can not tell? They are coming here and asking us to vote money for unexplained claims, and they refuse to give any facts about them, not a fact. We have not a fact in this RECORD upon which any man can vote to spend this $75,000,000 of the people's money. I do not see how any Senator could ever defend his vote in favor of this blanket authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to pay out, to whom he sees fit, these enormous sums of money.

Mr. President, I have read the provision for a public hearing. This is what we got:

That no part of the foregoing appropriations shall be used to pay any refund of income or profits tax pursuant to a claim allowed by the enactment of this act in excess of $20,000.

By the way, they probably will come in with the statement that all these claims have already been allowed.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. Just wait one moment. We must not interfere with noise in the Chamber. We will wait until Senators get through conversing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order. Senators will cease conversation and be in order.

Mr. HEFLIN. I was going to suggest to the Senator that if this provision is adopted, then all those who get refunds under $20,000 will make no accounting to the Senate, and Congress will never be permitted to see the list. We will be asked to vote for millions to pay the claims below that amount without having any testimony on which to act.

Mr. McKELLAR. We will see the list of names and the amounts. If one is diligent enough to go through the musty records in the Ways and Means Committee room, he will see them, but not otherwise.

Mr. HEFLIN. He would not see any testimony giving the reasons for the refunds.

Mr. McKELLAR. None whatever. They deny that any Senator has the right to see any testimony. They deny that any Senator has the right to make any inquiry about it, and the Senator will find in the hearings on this very bill that I asked the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury for the details in a certain case, and he said, "I am sorry, Senator; we are prohibited from giving you those facts."

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator knows that in some cases assessments are made erroneously.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course.

Mr. TYDINGS. In many cases people are required to pay substantially large sums and want to get back what they paid erroneously.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. Under the Senator's amendment—and I am for the Senator's amendment, I will say——

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank the Senator.

Mr. TYDINGS. It may be that some one has been taxed illegally, and a refund has been awarded to him. Would his claim be held up until the Senate could act upon it and he thereby be deprived of his money because of a whim of the Senate?

Mr. McKELLAR. No. If the Senator will let me read the amendment, he will see that that can not be. It provides:

Provided, That no part of the funds herein appropriated for tax refunds where the claim is in excess of $10,000 shall be paid out except upon hearings before any committee or officer in the department conducting same, which hearings shall be open to the public, and the decision shall be a public document.

Mr. TYDINGS. Would Congress then have to appropriate the money afterwards?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; it appropriates the money in this bill under that particular proviso.

Mr. TYDINGS. There would not be any delay, then?

Mr. McKELLAR. None whatever. The only thing that the taxpayer would have to do would be to submit his facts openly and above board and secure the redress that he was honestly entitled to, and not permit the present system of secrecy in the department, where clerks allow what they will and the Congress appropriates without the slightest knowledge of what the claim is.

I will go further. Then they except all judgments of courts, and that is right; they ought to be excepted. They except all judgments of the Board of Tax Appeals, and that is right; they ought to be excepted. Then they except this class, "cases determined upon precedents established in decisions of courts or the Board of Tax Appeals." Most of them are established upon precedent. That emasculates this amendment entirely, and if that provision did not do so the next one would, which provides:

The decision of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in any such refund allowance in excess of $20,000 shall be a public record.

Mr. President, I just want to say this: I imagine that this conference report is going to be agreed to. So many Senators have appropriations carried in the bill involving their States that they may vote for it. It ought not to be voted for. No Senator, because he has an appropriation in the bill, should vote to put this iniquitous measure on the statute books. But, assuming that the report is agreed to and the bill becomes a law, I give notice here and now that I am going to demand a decision in every single case that comes under this bill. The decisions must be in writing. We must know what the bureau is doing, because I think it is my duty as a Senator to see to it that the people's money is honestly expended and that it is not shoveled out in the secret way in which it is now being shoveled out in the Treasury Department.

Suppose some of you Senators were engaged in business, and you go back home and your secretary says to you, "Well, I need $50,000 to run your business another year." "What are you going to do with it?" "That is none of your business. I am going to do with it what I please. I am going to pay it out secretly if I desire. I am not going to let you interfere in any way with it."

How long would you keep that secretary? You would not keep him any longer than it would take you to say, "You are discharged." Yet that is what we are doing with Secretary Mellon. He comes here twice a year and demands these enormous appropriations—$130,000,000 in the general bill in December, $75,000,000 in the deficiency bill which we are now considering. "What do you want to do with it, Mr. Secretary?" "That is none of your business. You furnish me the money." "What cases have you, Mr. Secretary?" "That is none of your business. You furnish me the money."

That is the attitude of the Secretary. The Senate very timidly said the other day, after a long debate, "We are going to make you tell us somthing about it," and what did he do? He wrote his orders to the House, and said, "I will not stand for it. I do not want you to know anything about the conduct of my office. I do not want you to know any facts upon which to base these appropriations. Your duty is to furnish me the money and let me pay it out to whom I please."

I wonder how many Democratic Senators and how many Republican Senators are going to vote for that kind of an unfaithful service. Somebody asked whether I was criticizing the Secretary of the Treasury. I am criticizing the Secretary of the Treasury, not personally, but I am criticizing him officially. I think he is inefficient. I think this secret system which he has adopted is indefensible. I think he ought not to be Secretary of the Treasury, and he never will be Secretary of the Treasury again with my vote. I hope if Mr. Hoover sends his name in for reappointment that the Senate will rise in its might and reject the nomination. It ought to be rejected. We ought not to have a public servant put into office who acts as this public servant does, who comes here and takes part in legislation, who writes letters saying, "You must not look into my affairs." Even the Comptroller General has been excluded by law from interfering with or supervising the affairs of the Treasury Department. Upon what meat hath this Cæsar fed that he has become greater than his administration, greater than the Senate, greater than the House, greater than the Government that he is supposed to serve? I say it would be a monstrous thing if the Senate votes to uphold this report with this provision in it.

I have said all I desire to say. I am going to ask for a yea-and-nay vote when the question on agreeing to the conference report comes up. I do not think we ought to go on record as approving the report with this provision in it. The other provisions are fairly satisfactory, and I think we should all agree to them, but I shall never vote for this provision.

Mr. HEFLIN obtained the floor.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HASTINGS in the chair). Eighty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the matter presented by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] is very important. I want to repeat what I said here once before. There is not a commissioner's court in the United States that would approve a bill refunding $5 to any taxpayer unless the testimony taken in open court justified it. But the Senate is called upon to vote not for millions but for hundreds of millions of dollars in tax refunds to people unknown to the Senate and in the absence of any testimony whatever to justify such action.

In 1927 I introduced in the Senate a resolution calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish a list of those to whom he had refunded taxes. I could not obtain unanimous consent to have that resolution considered until I had agreed to provide that the amounts to be reported should be $25,000 and above. My resolution then passed. I now hold in my hand a list of those to whom taxes were refunded in 1927.

In the State of Pennsylvania there are about 100 refunds listed, and they range from $25,000 to $899,000. This favored list in Mr. Mellon's own State is given to us, but we have not a scintilla of evidence as to why he granted a single one of the refunds; and there is not a scintilla of evidence here with reference to the other States in the Union upon which the Senate can act and has acted heretofore. We are now called upon to appropriate money not only to meet the refunds he has granted recently but to supply him with a fund of millions of dollars to be used to refund in cases that have never yet been passed upon.

Senators, this is not a businesslike way to transact public affairs. We ought to know, and the time is coming when we will know in this body, just why any refund and every refund is made. Why should not we know that? I think it is a piece of impertinence and an insult to the intelligence of Senators to lay down before them a list of refunds with the amount just stated in bulk to be parceled out by the Secretary of the Treasury and that we should be denied any testimony whatsoever justifying the appropriation for that purpose.

I am going to challenge the Senate and any Member of the Senate to give me a dozen names of those to whom these millions of dollars are going to be refunded. There is not a Senator who can tell me one person who is going to receive this money out of the refund that is being provided for here to-day. There is not a Senator present who can give me a reason for voting for the refund that he is about to vote for here to-day. Senators, that is an astounding situation. If you were to do that in almost any county in the United States, a commissioner's court could not be found that was stupid enough to grant refunds to taxpayers without furnishing the reasons and spreading those reasons in a public record. They could not be reelected to the county commissioners' court if they did it. But here are Senators representing sovereign States of the Union called upon not to vote refunds of a few hundred dollars or a few thousand dollars but millions and hundreds of millions.

Mr. President, this thing has reached the point not only where it is an outrageous performance but where it has become a national scandal. If I were Secretary of the Treasury, I would not ask that a single one of these refunds be made without submitting to the Congress every item and a reason in every case why I had ordered the refunds made.

Mr. President, I saw some small measures held up here the other night. One case I recall in particular was that of a man who had been so severely injured while employed in the Government mail service that he had not moved hand or foot for 10 years. The whole Senate was halted for a moment; the bill was about to go over, when the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES] and myself came to the rescue of that poor, unfortunate fellow and caused his bill to be passed. He was asking for only $117 a month to keep him alive. Here, however, we are in the open Senate, in the closing hours of this session, voting, without rhyme or reason, millions and millions of dollars to be turned over to the Secretary of the Treasury to be given by him as refunds to people whom we know nothing about and where there is no testimony showing us the justification for such action. How can any Senator face his constituents if asked about such a situation? When they read the RECORD—and doubtless they will—and say, "Why, you voted for this amount; what were the facts that justified you?" you can not tell them. Here is what you will say; you can say nothing else: "Well, Mr. Mellon had somebody up there to audit the accounts, and some clerk who went over the files penciled a memorandum, made the calculation, and told another clerk that there was a mistake in the assessment; then they finally O. K'd what his finding was; somebody else passed on that; and that is how this claimant got his refund." O Mr. President, I repeat that there is not a county commissioner's court in the Union that would pass a claim upon such procedure as that. I have told the Senate before, and I am going now to repeat, that clerks in the department who have gone into the tax files of rich men have been tampered with. One of them, who made the refund calculation in the case of Doheny which enabled him to get back thousands and thousands of dollars, was taken out of the department by Doheny, and he employed him in his private business at a salary of $7,500 a year.

I repeat, this thing is becoming a national scandal. Where is the testimony—I challenge every Senator here to show it—that justified a Senator in voting for a single item in this refund list? It is not here. Now, we are called upon not only to turn this money over to Mr. Mellon to give to his friends who have already had their claims passed on by some file clerk, but we are asked to give him money in advance to refund to others. How do we know there will be any more refunds? Is there never going to be any end to this?

Are we going to keep on from session to session providing money in advance, encouraging and enticing these clerks and others to go in and hunt up other excuses for refunds? There is not a business organization anywhere on the face of the earth that would employ such tactics.

O Mr. President, I recall the story of the poem of The Moneyless Man:

> Go into the halls of fame,
> And find if you can,
> A welcome awaiting the moneyless man.

It can not be found, but the mighty rich have no trouble in securing their refunds. They can send up here a budget calling for $70,000,000 or $100,000,000, and Senators vote for it. We in this body put a provision in the bill by which we can protect the public, whereby we can protect the Government, whose guardians we are. We are sent here to preserve it in its integrity. We in this body adopt a provision that in no case above $10,000 shall a refund be made except testimony is taken and recorded, the judgment put upon the record, and that it may become a public document, not only where we may see it but where any patriotic citizen who is interested in his country may see it. That amendment goes to the House of Representatives, and evidently Mr. Mellon has brought pressure to bear on somebody over there and they have upset our plan; they have changed it.

I think it would be a good idea for the Senate just to deadlock this proposition and let this refund feature of the bill go over to the extra session of Congress. I think each House ought to treat the other with proper consideration. I have a kindly feeling for the other body; I served in it for 16 years.

Mr. President, I have a measure which has gone to the House of Representatives providing additional copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the Members of the House and Senate. The people of this Nation are writing to their Senators to put them on the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD list so that they may receive the RECORD, and Senators are writing back to them that their quota is exhausted and they can not put them on his list. Think of that!

A Senator now gets only 88 copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for his State and the House Members receive 60 copies. My bill, which has passed this body, provides that a Senator may receive 150 copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and that the House Members may each have 100 copies. That would enable the libraries and the schools over the country to obtain copies of the RECORD of the proceedings here each day in order that the people of this Nation may be informed as to what is going on regarding the public business here at the Capitol. But the House Committee on Printing will not report that measure out. I say very frankly the law is such that we can not get the additional copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD—and we need them—unless the House will vote to pass that measure. If the House were placed in a similar situation, and desired for its Members additional copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I would vote for such a measure, whether the Senate needed these extra copies or not, if the House could not get them in any other way. But action is delayed on that bill because some Member does not want to report it out of the Committee on Printing.

I secured the passage by the Senate of three very important measures affecting the cotton situation, one of them providing for obtaining additional cotton statistics, but those bills are still in the House. They have not been passed. It is true the Committee on the Census, at the request of Congressman RANKIN, of Mississippi, reported one of those measures favorably and placed it on the calendar, but it has been objected to twice and apparently is not going to be passed. Measures introduced in this body in which Senators and the people they represent are interested and which have passed the Senate are not being put through the House. Then, why should we hurry in the closing hours to bow to every beck and call of certain stubborn leaders of the House on questions such as are involved in this bill regarding refunds? I think if we would show some independence and demand that the measures which affect the rights of the American people be given attention, we would get somewhere with them.

Mr. President, I have written a letter to Members of the House delegation from my State as to the cotton bills. I should like to have a copy of that letter printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

(This letter was sent to each Member of the House from Alabama.)

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 12, 1929.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I wish to call to your attention three very important measures that I introduced and had passed through the Senate. All three of them are on the subject of cotton, and have for their purpose the prevention of certain practices that work great injury to the cotton producers of the South.

As you know, two of the measures referred to passed the Senate more than eight months ago, and the other one passed the Senate at this session.

You will recall that in September, 1927, for the first time in its history, the Agricultural Department arrogated to itself the right to predict what the price of cotton would be in the then near future; and that on the 15th of September of that year the Bureau of Economics in that department did issue a statement in which it predicted that the price of cotton would go down. The making of that prediction by the officials of the Agricultural Department broke the price of cotton $7 a bale on the first day and started a downward trend in prices that continued until prices fell from 24 cents to 16 cents a pound, which was a loss of $40 a bale to our cotton farmers, making the total loss on the cotton crop of that year $400,000,000.

As a member of the Senate Committee on Agriculture, which investigated that strange and disastrous performance, I questioned some of the most outstanding men in the cotton trade as to what effect the lower cotton price prediction made by the Agricultural Department had on the price of cotton in the fall of 1927, and without a single exception they all said that cotton prices were steadily advancing at the time; and the crop was small and the demand was great, and that if the Agricultural Department had not made that prediction the cotton crop of 1927 would have sold for at least 24 or 25 cents a pound, which would have meant $400,000,000 more in the pockets of our farmers.

I was convinced that a great wrong had been done the cotton producer by a department of our Government, created for his benefit and protection, and that somebody in the Agricultural Department had been reached and influenced—and I think corruptly—to make that cotton-price prediction in order to break the price of cotton and demoralize the cotton trade of the United States. It did both. Desiring to prevent the recurrence of such a calamity and crime, I introduced a bill in the Senate which made it a crime punishable by fine and imprisonment for any Government official in the Agricultural Department, or any other department, to make or publish any prediction regarding the price of cotton. The Senate Committee on Agriculture, of which I am a member, approved my bill and reported it favorably to the Senate. I then secured its passage through that body.

This measure of so much importance to our cotton producers has now been in the House for several months awaiting action by that body, and as the last session of the present Congress will end on March 4 I am very anxious, and it is exceedingly important, to have this bill passed by the House and enacted into law before that time. It must be passed at this session if our cotton farmers are to have the benefit of its protection during the coming cotton-selling season. I, therefore, appeal to you to do everything you can to have this measure passed by the House at an early date so that the President can approve it before the 4th of March.

Another important cotton measure that I introduced in the Senate, and which I had passed by that body several months ago, was one to require the Government to collect and publish in a separate item the statistics of cotton known as "snaps" and "bollies." This cotton is of an inferior grade. It is not fully developed and it is gathered while in the unopened green boll. The bolls are pulled from the stalks and then dried through a heating process and the undeveloped or immature cotton is threshed out by a machine made for that purpose. This kind of cotton is produced in Oklahoma and Texas and amounts to five or six hundred thousand bales a year. Sometimes more. It is now reported bale for bale with cotton fully developed and gathered in the natural way from the open boll on the stalk.

This quality of cotton does not possess the qualities of fully developed cotton and the law does not allow it to be tendered on contracts and it ought not to be counted in with the supply of real tenderable and fully developed spinable cotton. It ought to be separated and reported in an item to itself and not mixed in and counted in with the real cotton supply. Then the Government's report would read "so many bales of cotton and so many bales of 'snaps' and 'bollies.'"

The counting in of these "snaps" and "bollies" with real cotton is misleading to the public as to the real cotton supply, and it is injurious to the cotton farmer because this immature, inferior stuff is used in the statistics of the cotton supply to make the supply appear larger than it is. And reported in that way it helps to depress the price. Let the statistics speak the truth and tell in one item how many bales of cotton there are and in another item how many bales of "snaps" and "bollies" there are.

As the matter now stands the Government would report, we will say, a crop of 13,500,000 bales. My bill would compel the Government report to show 13,000,000 bales of cotton and 500,000 bales of "snaps" and "bollies." It is a crime against the cotton farmer to have this stuff counted in with the cotton supply, and my bill, when it passes the House, will prevent such a thing from being done in the future.

My other cotton bill, the one that passed the Senate last week, provides that "linters"—the little fuzzy fiber on the cottonseed—shall be reported in an item to itself so that the number of bales of "linters" will not be counted in as a part of the cotton supply.

As a result of my efforts and the efforts of Senator HARRIS, of Georgia, the Government now reports the number of bales of "linters" produced each year in an item separate from the amount of cotton produced, but, unfortunately, it stops there. What I am now trying to do, and what my bill provides shall be done, is to prevent the counting in with the amount of cotton on hand or in the "carry-over" of cotton in the United States the bulk of the "linters" supply without designating it as "linters."

We are now producing more than 1,000,000 bales of "linters" a year and the counting of the "linters" supply in with the cotton supply is deceptive and misleading to the public and hurtful to the producer, because, when counted in as cotton, it makes the supply of cotton appear to be a million more bales than it is, and the impression is made on the mind of the cotton trade that the cotton supply is large and that depresses the price of cotton and injures the cotton farmer. Now, under the provisions of my bill, the Government report will show "so many bales of cotton," and in a separate item, "so many bales of 'linters.'"

The Government reports now giving the amount of cotton on hand from time to time do not say "so many bales of cotton, so many bales of 'snaps' and 'bollies,' and so many bales of 'linters.'" The reports refer to it all as "so many bales of cotton."

As you can readily see, my bill would take out of the cotton report as it now appears a million and a half bales of "snaps" and "bollies" and "linters" that now appear in the report of the cotton supply. That would help cotton prices greatly. I have seen the price go down by the Government's report showing an increase in the cotton supply of 200,000 bales.

I believe that the passage of this bill would be worth millions of dollars to our cotton producers every year. Here is a copy of my bill:

"Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter, in collecting and publishing statistics of cotton on hand in warehouses and other storage establishments, and of cotton known as the 'carry-over' in the United States, the Director of the Census is hereby directed to ascertain and publish as a separate item in the report of cotton statistics the number of bales of linters as distinguished from the number of bales of cotton."

Please do what you can to rush the passage of this bill and the other two cotton bills that I have mentioned. All three of them are in the House awaiting your favorable action.

With best wishes, I am yours, sincerely,

J. THOS. HEFLIN.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, this is what occurred in the House when my bill was up for consideration February 25, 1929:

ADDITIONAL COTTON STATISTICS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 4206) authorizing the Director of the Census to collect and publish certain additional cotton statistics.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. President, the bill here referred to is the one that I had passed by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, at the present time we have a permanent law that requires the Secretary of Agriculture to collect statistics of the grades and staple of cotton, the amount tenderable and untenderable. The agricultural appropriation bill carries an appropriation of $420,000 to gather these statistics for the next fiscal year. I feel that this bill just read from the calendar will only duplicate what already is being done and I shall feel compelled to object. I can see no justification for the additional expenditure.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I will be glad to reserve it.

Mr. RANKIN. If the gentleman from Texas had been with us last year when we went into a thorough investigation of the manipulation of the cotton market, he would not object to this bill. The law to which he refers does not cover this point at all. This bill is in the interest of the cotton growers of the South. It is necessary, and the legislation to which he refers does not take care of the situation.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am convinced by the statement of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I have the highest respect for the judgment and opinion of the gentleman from Mississippi. He is a very able and useful Member of Congress, but I have investigated this matter thoroughly; I know the kind of reports that the Department of Agriculture issues each month. They issue it on the staple, the grades, and the amount that is tenderable and the untenderable, and Congress has appropriated $420,000 for that purpose. I feel as if we ought not to duplicate in the Department of Commerce what the Department of Agriculture is already doing under a mandatory law.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, if we were doing that, if we were protecting these people, it would be a different thing. In order to show the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] where he is absolutely wrong and where it is impossible to protect the cotton growers and the cotton trade under the present system, last year this very trouble arose because of the fact that these representatives of the Department of Agriculture had put their stamp of approval on cotton that was untenderable and permitted it to be offered on the exchange and drove the price of cotton down, to the economic injury of the cotton farmers.

These untenderable snaps and bollies—and you gentlemen from the spinning districts ought to be interested in this—are piling up into the carry-over, and it is heralded to the world every year that this amount of cotton is on hand, without the information being given that it is snaps and bollies. As a result, only a year or two ago, with this report coming out, the mills of the country took it for granted that that was tenderable cotton; and when finally the facts were known you people from New England paid the penalty of having to purchase your cotton after it had drifted into the hands of these speculators and manipulators, whom we are trying to curb by this legislation.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in my remarks a portion of a table issued by the Department of Agriculture that does show the amount of cotton that is tenderable and the amount that is untenderable. I do that to show what is being done. I think this table will clearly show that the Department of Agriculture is now doing everything that is necessary to give complete information as to the grades, staple lengths, and other information of cotton ginned.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by publishing a table issued by the Department of Agriculture. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, at this point I insert a portion of a table issued by the Department of Agriculture February 15, 1929.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. This bill requires three objectors.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks to show that the very people to whom the gentleman from Texas refers passed and stamped——

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I object to the gentleman going into a general debate about my motives. I do not question his in the least. I feel it my duty to object.

Mr. RANKIN. I am not questioning the gentleman's motives, but since he is going to extend his remarks and put into the RECORD representation from the Department of Agriculture, I want to show that the very representatives to whom he refers passed as tenderable cotton cotton that was untenderable, and helped to wreck the cotton market last year.

I also ask to have printed in the RECORD at this point another letter which I wrote to a member of the Alabama delegation, and copies were sent to other members of the Alabama delegation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 22, 1929.

Hon. WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD,
House of Representatives.

DEAR WILL: Your letter has been received and noted.

From answers that I have received from some of the members of our Alabama delegation in the House, it is clear that some of the members of the House Committee on Agriculture do not understand the purpose of my bills regarding "linters," "snaps," and "bollies." I am seeking to eliminate all three of them from the count of cotton produced annually and "on hand" at different periods at warehouses and other storage establishments and in the "carry over" of actual cotton at the end of the season.

My point is that "linters" is not cotton and should not be counted at any time as a part of the cotton supply. "Bollies" is not cotton because of its undeveloped and immature fiber. It is not entitled to be classed as cotton, and therefore should not be counted in at the end of the year as a part of the cotton supply. It is unfair and unjust to the cotton producer to have it so counted. "Seconds" and "shorts" come out of wheat, but they are not counted as "flour." "Snaps," it is true, is a kind of cotton. Some of it is developed, but it is not gathered in the usual way by plucking it from the open boll in the field, clean and free from other substance, but the cotton in the boll, burr, and all the trash lugged in with every boll is pulled from the stalk. And I contend that on account of its low grade and inferior quality it ought not to come in and be counted bale for bale with cotton fully developed and picked with human fingers from the open boll, as our farmers gather all their cotton in Alabama and other Southern States, with the exception of Texas and Oklahoma, where they produce every year more than a half million bales of "snaps" and "bollies."

The flour mill man does not count "seconds" and "shorts" and "bran" as a part of his flour supply. He reports so many sacks of "flour," so many sacks of "seconds," so many sacks of "shorts," and so many sacks of "bran." And my bills would require the Government reports to show so many bales of "actual cotton," so many bales of "linters," so many bales of "bollies" and so many bales of "snaps." In that way I believe we would eliminate every year at least one and a half million bales from the amount of cotton now claimed in the annual production, and from time to time in the amount of cotton "on hand" and in the amount of the "carry over" of cotton at the end of the season.

As I said before, I was the first one to bring about a separation of the number of bales of "linters" produced each year from the item in the Government reports of the number of bales of cotton produced. That is now being done. That report now shows when the crop is gathered and ginned the number of bales of cotton produced and the number of bales of "linters," but there is no report and no attention is now called to the number of bales of "bollies" and the number of bales of "snaps." That low grade, undeveloped, and inferior stuff is counted in as a part of the cotton supply, and I claim that it is fraudulently used to make the size of the crop look large, and counted and used during the year to make it appear that there is a large supply of cotton "on hand." And the same thing is done with regard to the report of cotton in the "carry over," all of which is injurious to the cotton producer.

While it is true that the number of bales of "linters" is now reported at the end of the season separate from the number of bales of cotton produced, it is a fact nevertheless that from then on "linters" is lost in the shuffle as a separate item, and you don't hear of "linters" any more. My bill on "linters" passed by the Senate and now in the House, would prevent unscrupulous Government employees from counting "linters" in as a part of the cotton supply to help depress the price. It would compel them to account for the whereabouts of "linters" during the year, and when the "carry over" is announced it would require them to report it in a separate item as the flour man reports "bran" in an item separate and apart from "flour."

There are scores of cotton speculators who are always working to beat down the price of cotton, who would pay a large sum of money to unscrupulous Government employees to have a million bales added to the cotton supply. You will doubtless recall that a few years ago Hyde and Holmes, two crooked Government employees in the Agricultural Department, added 250,000 bales to the Government report, for which they were paid $40,000 each. That thieving act of theirs broke the price of cotton about $7 a bale and enabled the bear speculators to make hundreds of thousands of dollars. And that money was taken out of the pockets of the cotton producers.

The fact that certain Government employees in the Agricultural Department, and also in the Census Bureau, are, as I understand it, opposing this proposed cotton legislation is a very strong reason why it should be enacted into law. If they are not now making an improper and wrongful use of "linters," "snaps," and "bollies" in reporting on the "cotton supply," they would have no objection to a law requiring them to call by its proper name and separate all that stuff from the amount of "actual cotton" produced, "on hand," and in the "carry-over." As the matter now stands, the opportunity is there for crooks to make millions by adding to the cotton supply and making it appear large. That kind of thing is worth millions to the bear speculators, for it always breaks the price.

I have given you these additional points in the hope that they may be helpful to you and the other members of our delegation should you find it necessary to demand of the Rules Committee, of which you are a member, a special rule for the consideration and passage of these cotton bills at this session of Congress.

Hoping that you may be able to get favorable action, and with best wishes, I am

Yours sincerely,

J. THOS. HEFLIN,
Alabama Delegation.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I want to say before I take my seat that no Senator here will vote more quickly than I to provide appropriations to make refunds to taxpayers who have been unjustly treated, who have paid money into the Treasury which they ought not to have paid. I have thought all along that ought to be done, and I now think it ought to be done; but, Senators, the taxpayers of this Nation have not made the mistake of paying over $3,000,000,000 more than they should. The more than $3,000,000,000 which have been refunded in rebates, credits, and refunds should not have been so refunded. I do not believe that Mr. Mellon can submit to this body or the House the testimony justifying him in making such enormous refunds.

Mr. President, I can understand how it is possible to make mistakes in the case of large tax returns, and in collecting the vast sums of money which the Government collects; but, Senators, such mistakes as have been charged up against the Government in the records of the Treasury Department have not been made. The taxpayer himself is on the alert; he is not going to pay any more than he is compelled to pay; he is very careful to have his business gone over; he is very careful to hedge and protect his interest at every turn; and when the Government finally collects from him he has done everything in his power to protect his pocketbook, as he has a right to do. It is the duty of the Government to see to it that he does not pay a cent more than that which is due the Government. So, the Government being on the alert to get exactly what is due it and no more, and the taxpayer being on the alert to pay exactly what is due the Government and no more, I submit to this intelligent Senate that mistakes involving over $3,000,000,000 in paying taxes to the Government have not been made. The truth is—and we can not get away from it—that refunds have been made to favorites. I am convinced of that, and I have a right to suspect that there is something wrong when the testimony is not submitted here to show me that the Treasury Department was justified in making such refunds.

Mr. President, it is an outrageously scandalous performance, and I think that a great many Senators are going to be confronted with this question next year; I hope they will be; and that the people at home will ask them, "Why did you vote to give these millions to those people in refunds, without any testimony to justify it? Why, you did not know yourself why you were doing it; you did not have the testimony in a single case, did you?" The Senator so questioned will say, "No; I did not." He will then be asked, "Can you tell me now why you voted for it?" "No; I can not." "Well," the questioner will say, "we will send somebody up there who will at least be smart enough to think he knows what is going on in the conduct of the Government's affairs."

Mr. President, the portion of the conference report affecting this matter ought not to be accepted; we ought to send it back and ask for a further conference with the House, and hold the provision in the bill as the Senate adopted it in the first place, because it is right. Nobody can deny that. If it is right, it ought to remain in the bill. If it is wrong, let us be shown wherein it is wrong. That has not been done, and it can not be done.

Mr. President, there are enough Senators here, if they want to, either to tie up this bill or to send it back for further conference. I know it is exceedingly hard to arouse any enthusiasm when you are preaching a crusade against entrenched privilege in this Nation. I know it is hard to enthuse some Senators, to get them to stand up and fight in the open against this high-handed business of handing out refunds as favors and Christmas gifts and birthday presents to the mighty rich of this Nation; but, Mr. President, that has been the trouble with every nation that ever existed. Those in authority reached the point where they looked to the wealthy class, to the mighty rich, for political favors and support, and they forgot the rights and the interests of the masses of the people.

They forgot the government and their duty to preserve it and they pandered to that other sentiment, until one day the nation fell. That is the story of every government that has perished in the long night of time. Let this Government wake up, and let us say to the mighty rich: "We have no prejudice against you. We want you to accumulate a fortune if you can do it honestly. It is the duty of every man to acquire a fair share of this world's goods and to provide well for those dependent upon him; but you must not reach the time where your god is gold and where you think more of your material possessions than you do of right and justice and the welfare of the Government and the people of this Nation."

They may reach that point, but we, at least, ought to stand firm and fear not. We must have standards to go by; and we who are in charge of the Government ought at least to stand here and fight to the last ditch for what we know is right and just and fair.

I submit before I sit down that no Senator here can assail the position I have taken. You have not any testimony to justify you in voting a dollar of refunds in this bill. You do not know of a single person who is going to receive a refund. You do not know of testimony anywhere that will justify a single refund; and, think of that! How shocking it is that the Senate is about to be called upon to vote again upon a question upon which it has absolutely no testimony whatever to justify its action!

GROWTH OF AMERICAN IMPERIALISM

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article prepared by People's Lobby, John Dewey, president, Washington, D. C., entitled "Growth of American Imperialism."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HASTINGS in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is here printed, as follows:

Imperialism and World Politics, by Dr. Parker T. Moon, of Columbia University, published by the Macmillan Co., presents the outstanding facts about the growth of imperialism and the relation to world politics. His description of the growth of American imperialism since the Spanish-American War is of particular importance.

He quotes C. S. Olcott's Life of William McKinley as to how he reached his decision about the Philippines:

"I walked the floor of the White House night after night until midnight; and I am not ashamed to tell you, gentlemen, that I went down on my knees and prayed Almighty God for light and guidance more than one night. And one night late it came to me this way—I don't know how it was, but it came:

"(1) That we could not give them back to Spain—that would be cowardly and dishonorable (national honor theme);

"(2) That we could not turn them over to France or Germany—our commercial rivals in the Orient—that would be bad business and discreditable (economic nationalism);

"(3) That we could not leave them to themselves—they were unfit for self-government—and they would soon have anarchy and misrule worse than Spain's war (racial superiority);

"(4) That there was nothing left for us to do but to take them all, and to educate the Filipinos, and uplift and civilize and christianize them as our fellow men, for whom Christ also died. (Altruism, the 'white man's burden,' and missionary zeal. The Filipinos, by the way, were already Christians, Roman Catholics, with the exception of a small number of Mohammedan tribesmen.)

"And then I went to bed, and went to sleep, and slept soundly."

THE MONROE DOCTRINE AND IMPERIALISM

"In the smaller countries of Latin America," writes an American publicist, "controlled by our soldiers, our bankers, and our oil kings, we are developing our Irelands, our Egypts, and our Indias." The Latin-American policy of the United States—"dollar diplomacy, with its combination of bonds and battleships"—is essentially imperialist, so he believes, and "means the destruction of our Nation just as surely as it meant the destruction of Egypt and Rome and Spain and Germany and all the other nations who came to measure their greatness by their material possessions rather than by their passion for justice and by the number of their friendly neighbors." (Dr. Samuel Guy Inman.)

Certainly there can be no question that in the nineteenth century most of South America, all Central America, Mexico, and the Caribbean Islands were in conditions which would ordinarily constitute an invitation to imperialism. In Asia and Africa and the Pacific, countries having rich undeveloped natural resources in combination with weak governments, have almost universally been subject to imperialism; one recalls Egypt, Tunis, Turkey, Morocco, Persia, Indo-China, China, Korea, not to mention more backward areas. The Latin-American States, like these, had undeveloped resources calling for European capital and for European concession hunters, and as a general rule Latin-American governments were weak, frequently subject to revolution, lacking powerful armies or navies to repel European aggression.

PORTO RICO

The smaller island of Porto Rico was annexed outright at the close of the Spanish War. This was pure imperialism. After a transitional period of administration by the military authority, a civil government was established under the Foraker Act, passed by the United States Congress. Though a house of delegates, elected by the people, was established, the controlling power was vested in a governor general and an executive council of officials appointed by the President of the United States with the advice and consent of the United States Senate. This system was liberalized by the Jones Act of 1917, which granted American citizenship to the inhabitants of Porto Rico, and created an elective senate, but still government was far from autonomous, and Porto Ricans complained of their condition. On the other hand, there could be no question that as regards sanitation, education, and economic production (sugar, tobacco, coffee, fruit, etc.), American rule was highly beneficial. The death rate was reduced from 26 to 18.7 per thousand. Some 2,500 schools were established. Nor could there be any doubt that the increased commerce of Porto Rico was almost wholly with the United States. Porto Rican exports increased from $10,000,000 in 1900 to eighty-eight and one-fourth millions in 1924; Porto Rican imports, from ten millions to eighty-nine and one-half millions. The share of the United States in the island's exports rose from 34 per cent in 1900 to 91 per cent in 1924, while the percentage of the island's imports supplied by the United States grew from 70 per cent in 1900 to 90 per cent in 1924. This was partly due to the tariff arrangement, whereby exports from the United States are admitted to Porto Rico—and vice versa—free of duty, whereas foreign goods are subject to the duties prescribed in the United States tariff. Trade figures show that the island means many millions of dollars' worth of business to the American iron and steel industry, the cotton manufacturers, and soap makers, as well as to American importers of sugar and tobacco. If occasionally there were complaints that laborers in Porto Rico were underpaid and overworked, or that the American administration was solicitous chiefly for American interests, these were but jarring minor notes in the major cadence of prosperity.

CANAL CONSTRUCTION AND DOLLAR DIPLOMACY IN CENTRAL AMERICA

After the Spanish-American War the pressure of the United States was felt in Central America. Central America consisted of five small republics (Guatemala, Salvador, Honduras, Nicaragua, and Costa Rico), besides a very small British colony of British Honduras, and the Isthmus of Panama, then part of the adjoining South American Republic of Colombia. In parts of Central America American fruit interests had acquired considerable economic importance; there were also British railway interests, and German-owned plantations. Not economics, however, but strategy was the dominating factor in the situation. For decades various plans had been discussed for the construction of a ship canal through Nicaragua or through the Isthmus of Panama to afford commerce a short cut from the Atlantic to the Pacific. There was a question, however, whether such a canal ought to be American or neutral and international. Back in the year 1850 the Clayton-Bulwer treaty between the United States and England had provided that any such canal must be unfortified, neutral, under international guarantee. Such restrictions were repugnant to the exhuberant national spirit which prevailed immediately after the Spanish-American War, and from England—then preoccupied with the Boer War—permission was obtained by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901 to construct a canal under American control, to be policed by the United States, on condition that such a canal should be open to the merchant vessels and warships of all nations, in war and in peace, without discrimination or inequality of tolls.

It would have been relatively easy to obtain from Nicaragua the right to dig a canal across Nicaraguan territory, and this route was favored by a commission of investigation, but President Roosevelt and the Senate for various technical reasons preferred the route across Panama. Roosevelt obtained from Congress authority to use this route if he could make the arrangements within a reasonable time and at reasonable expense.

The advantage gained by the United States in undertaking the construction of the canal single handed, instead of allowing it to be an international enterprise was not commercial. By the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, foreign ships enjoy the same rights and pay the same tolls as American vessels; and when Congress in 1912 attempted to exempt American coastwise shipping from all tolls, Britain protested, with the result that the tolls exemption law was repealed in June, 1914, at President Wilson's insistent and high-minded demand. The advantage, let it be repeated, was not commercial, but strategic. The United States could and did fortify the canal, so that in case of war it could be defended against attack, and so that it constituted virtually another naval base on the Caribbean Sea. This naval acquisition, however, inspired American naval experts with an earnest desire for additional naval outposts in the Caribbean to protect the canal. The canal built to protect the United States now had to be protected by further acquisitions, notably Fonseca Bay, the Corn Islands, the Danish West Indies, Haiti, and Santo Domingo. But of these, more will have to be said.

The digging of the canal meant that Central America must become very definitely an American "sphere of interest," as European imperialists would say. Certainly no other great power could be allowed to gain a foothold near the canal—at any rate, no foothold nearer than the existing British possessions (British Honduras, Jamaica, etc.). Increasingly the United States overshadowed the Central American Republics. Panama, though "independent," was a protégé if not a protectorate of the United States; from the beginning her existence had depended on American protection; the Canal Zone, occupied by American military and naval forces, was in the middle of the Republic. Europeans would call Panama a "veiled protectorate."

Immediately north of Panama lies Costa Rica, better governed than its neighbors, probably because it has a larger percentage of cultured white inhabitants and a smaller number of illiterate half-castes and negroes. In Costa Rica the mines, banks, commerce, and railways were controlled largely by foreigners, and the United Fruit Co.'s banana plantations were of great importance. Oil interests, however, were more decisive. In 1915 and 1916 Americans obtained extensive oil exploration rights. When in 1917 a revolutionary government headed by Federico Tinoco seized power and seemed disposed to grant oil concessions to the Cowdray (British) interests, President Wilson refused recognition; and even though Costa Rica joined in the war against Germany, still recognition was withheld, and Costa Rica was excluded from the peace conference. The attitude of the United States encouraged a successful rebellion against Tinoco in 1919. One needs hardly add the new Government, headed by President Acosta, and less prejudiced in favor of British oil interests, was soon recognized. Presently it was reported that the British concessions were canceled. Costa Rica is "independent," but her Government must respect the new Monroe doctrine, the doctrine that the United States has a veto on concessions.

Nicaragua, next to the north, came more definitely under American domination. President Jose Santos Zelaya unwisely opposed American interests. When in 1909 a rebel movement "friendly to American interests" was set on foot with American backing, Zelaya committed the supreme act of imprudence by executing two Americans for attempting to dynamite a troopship. Thereupon Secretary Knox severed diplomatic relations with Zelaya's government, and Zelaya was soon ousted. Now Knox's plans could be carried out. Thomas C. Dawson, who had previously been concerned in establishing the American receivership for the Dominican Republic, and who had served as American minister to Panama, was sent to Nicaragua to arrange "the reestablishment of a constitutional government," a settlement of American claims, and a loan from American bankers.

In consultation—on board an American warship—with the leaders who had overthrown Zelaya, Dawson made what has been called the Dawson pact (1910), including provision for a loan guaranteed by customs receipts, and for the election of Gen. Juan Estrada as President. But Estrada soon found the task of governing an indignant people too much for him; and Adolfo Diaz, formerly a bookkeeper in American employ, was given the presidency in 1911 and maintained in office, against the wishes of the population, by the presence of a small force of American marines at Managua and the occasional appearance of American warships off the coast. With him, Knox was able to make a convention June 6, 1911, for a loan of $15,000,000 to Nicaragua, guaranteed by Nicaraguan customs receipts. Though the United States Senate refused to ratify this treaty, other loan contracts were put through from time to time, an American was appointed to control the collection of Nicaraguan customs revenues, and the Nicaraguan railways were pledged to American bankers. Years later, William Jennings Bryan revived the dollar diplomacy of Knox and negotiated the Bryan-Chamorro treaty of 1915, whereby, in return for $3,000,000, to be expended under American direction, Nicaragua submitted to American financial control, granted the United States exclusive rights to build an interoceanic canal (this to forestall possible competition with Panama), and gave the United States a 99-year lease of the Corn Islands and the right to have a naval base on the Gulf of Fonseca. Nicaragua thus became another ward of the United States.

Nicaragua's customs revenues were collected under American supervision. A commission of one Nicaraguan and two Americans was appointed to supervise Nicaragua's expenditures. American bankers, notably Brown Bros. and J. W. Seligman, virtually controlled the country's finances, banking, and railways. And American marines prevented, or aided in suppressing, insurrections against this agreeable state of affairs.

When Nicaragua's neighbors protested that the naval provisions of this treaty infringed their boundary rights, and when the Central American Court of Justice, which the United States had helped to establish in 1907, decided that this protest was just, the United States ignored the decision, and thereby delivered a mortal blow to the court.

Criticism of American policy in Nicaragua was probably responsible for the decision of the United States Government to withdraw its marines in August, 1925, as a proof that the United States was not endeavoring to dominate the little Republic. Moreover, a new electoral law, drafted by American experts, was adopted by Nicaragua, and the American experts were invited to supervise the elections. Naval domination thus gave place to expert advice; but it requires little imagination to predict that should any Nicaraguan Government attempt to cancel American financial and naval privileges, the marines would again do their duty at Managua.

Honduras, a land of cattle ranches owned by Hondurans, mines owned by American and British corporations, and banana plantations owned by Americans, has a relatively large Indian, Negro, and half-breed population, and a small white upper class. Such ingredients produce political instability, revolutions, dictatorships, and filibustering. Civil war between rival political factions afforded the occasion for the landing of American marines in 1924, and American intervention succeeded in restoring order.

Salvador, the smallest of the Central American Republics, but densely populated, prosperous, and fertile, remained independent until 1922, its commerce being conducted laregly by English, Dutch, and German exporters, its coffee crop increasing, its Government fairly stable. In 1922 Salvador made a loan contract with Minor C. Keith, head of the United Fruit Co., for the issue of bonds amounting to a maximum of $21,500,000. Part of the issue consisted of 6 per cent bonds to cancel an old English loan; another part consisted of 8 per cent bonds sold to New York bankers at 88 per cent of their face value and redeemable at 105 per cent of their face value; and a third part 7 per cent bonds. The significant feature of the contract was the provision that 70 per cent of the Republic's customs revenues were pledged to pay interest and sinking-fund charges on this loan. The 70 per cent was to be paid directly to a bank named by Mr. Keith. In case of default this bank was to transmit through the United States Department of State the names of two persons, one of whom would be selected by Salvador, to act as collector general of the entire customs revenue. Disputes regarding the contract were to be referred through the Washington State Department to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. The inference drawn by the bankers was:

"It is simply not thinkable that after a Federal judge has decided any question or dispute between the bondholders and the Salvador Government that the United States Government should not take the necessary steps to sustain such a decision. There is a precedent in a dispute between Costa Rica and Panama, in which a warship was sent to carry out the verdict of the arbitrators."

Salvador, in short, becomes a financial dependency of American bankers acting with the cooperation of the United States Government.

In Guatemala, the most northerly of the six Republics, the United Fruit Co. grows bananas, and there are considerable American railway interests. Over Guatemala the United States did not establish control, however, perhaps because the country was farthest removed from the canal, perhaps because the administration was friendly to foreign capital and to the United States. Guatemala, for instance, offered the United States the use of its waters, ports, and railways in the war against Germany in 1917–18.

In general, it may be said that since the Panama Revolution American bankers have been rapidly acquiring control of Central American railways and other enterprises, and, in cooperation with the Department of State, have been extending control over the finances of Central American governments. This is "dollar diplomacy." It has been supported by marines, warships, and what we might call naval diplomacy. It has made Central America a sphere of interest of the United States, in which European intervention would be resented, in which concessions to European capitalists may not be made without danger of offending the watchful eye of the Department of State, in which American naval and economic interests hold undisputed supremacy.

The iron hand is usually covered with a velvet glove, as may best be illustrated by the Central American conference of 1923. The Washington State Department considered it desirable to have the armies of the Central American Republics reduced and a court of arbitration established to prevent petty wars in Central America. The court which had been established in 1908, it will be recalled, had expired in 1918, after the Fonseca Gulf case. A new court would have to be created. Moreover, there was a strong movement in Central America toward Federal union, and Washington was apparently desirous of having a hand in any such federation. Accordingly, in 1922 the Presidents of Nicaragua, Honduras, and Salvador were invited to talk matters over on board the U. S. cruiser Tacoma, and there a preliminary understanding was reached, with the result that the United States next invited delegates of the five Republics (not including Panama) to confer in Washington with Secretary Hughes as their host. That the affairs of Central America should be settled in distant Washington, instead of at home, seemed not to occur to Mr. Hughes. Under his tactful guidance the conference agreed on an arbitration court; armies were limited, a free-trade convention was signed, and various other unifying measures were adopted. The United States presided over Central American affairs and presided with a hand which could be gentle, though firm.

Haiti continued independent until 1915. In the summer of that year the American public, or as much of it as reads the foreign news dispatches, was shocked to learn that President Villbrun Guillaume Sam, of Haiti, had caused 200 political prisoners to be butchered in cold blood, and that he himself had taken refuge in the French consulate, only to be dragged out and beheaded by an irate mob. That American marines should thereupon have been landed to restore order seemed natural enough. Subsequently, however, it appeared that more than a year before this bloody drama the United States had unsuccessfully demanded the signature of a treaty giving the United States charge of the customs collection and debt service, as in Santo Domingo, and that the United States Navy Department had dispatched the Washington to Haiti in January, 1915. It also appeared that a strong reason for this forehanded action was to prevent Germany from obtaining a naval base in Haiti. It was the French, however, rather than the Germans, who landed marines in June, 1915, to be followed by United States marines in July. All this seems to have occurred before the massacre of July 26 and the beheading of July 27, 1915.

After the events of July 26–27, more American marines were landed, and Rear Admiral Caperton took charge of the customhouses and administration against the protest of the Haitian Congress. The treaty which had been rejected by Haiti before the occupation could now be put through with ease and dispatch. A president who would accept the desired treaty was elected in August, 1915, and the treaty was signed on September 16. The United States, so this interesting document stipulated, would aid Haiti in developing her agricultural, mineral, and commercial resources; the United States would also name a general receiver and financial adviser to hold Haiti's purse strings and see that the bankers owning Haitian bonds got their due; Haiti would make no new loans or changes in her tariff without obtaining consent from the White House; nor would Haiti lease or cede territory to any foreign power; and, finally, not only would the United States organize an armed constabulary to establish order in Haiti, but also American forces would intervene whenever necessary in the future to preserve individual liberty, life, and property. This meant a protectorate, if there ever was one.

As there was inevitably some popular opposition in Haiti to this signing away of the Republic's independence, it was not thought expedient to permit elections until 1922. American marines still remained in the island, and the elections went off well enough, resulting in the election of a President who promised to cooperate loyally with the United States. And still the marines remained. While the occupation continued, American business interests were actively carrying out the treaty pledge to aid in developing Haitian resources. New York banking interests purchased control of the Banque Nationale de la Republique d'Haiti. American capitalists bought up land, sugar mills, railways, lighting plants, and other property.

Moreover, the American naval authorities were active in promoting sanitation and road building. The natives might not enjoy being compelled to work on the roads under the supervision of American engineers, but Americans felt that the end justified the means. Let the Haitians protest as they would, American newspapers such as the New York Times were joyfully certain that "the Americans are in Haiti to raise its people from a state of ignorance and savagery for which their rules were responsible. * * *." An official American report insisted that the occupation was characterized by "freedom from all suggestion of selfish aims." The United States, in short, was assuming a small share of "the white man's burden."

PAN AMERICANISM

In the rest of South America the interest of the United States has been less vigorous. To be sure, the Monroe doctrine applied originally and still applies to the entire southern continent, as well as to Central and North America, and the United States would undoubtedly resent European or Asiatic encroachment on the independence or integrity of any of the Latin-American Republics; but the United States has evinced no concern over the settlement of large numbers of Germans in Brazil, Italians in Argentina, and of some Japanese and Chinese in several countries; nor has the United States attempted to exercise south of the Equator the veto on concessions or the same strict censorship of revolutions or the police power which have been asserted in the Caribbean region. Moreover, there has been a growing tendency in the United States to regard at least the progressive "A, B, C powers" (Argentina, Brazil, and Chile) as associates rather than protégés; it has even been proposed that these if not other South American nations should become partners with the United States in maintaining a modified Monroe doctrine, a mutual guaranty of independence. President Wilson, notably, in his address at the Second Pan American Scientific Congress in 1916, proposed that the States of America unite "in guaranteeing to each other absolute political independence and territorial integrity."
